SELECTION
FROM THE WRITINGS
THOMAS EMLYN.

THOMAS EMLYN.

AMONG the victims of religious persecution, few have been more conspicuous, or suffered with a purer or nobler mind, than the subject of the present memoir. His case is the more remarkable as belonging to a period, when the ignorance of barbarous times had retired before the opening day of truth and rational investigation, and as occurring in a country, where the protestant principles had already been made the foundation of the national church, and where it was the boast of the laws, that they protected the innocent, and secured the rights of conscience. An instance of persecution, even under circumstances like these, needs not be cited, it is true, to prove that fanaticism and bigotry heed not the voice of law, and are deaf to the eloquence of justice and reason; the history of the church is black with the records of this fact, so dishonourable to the christian name and character; yet there were incidents attending Mr Emlyn's case, which distinguished it from almost every other, and which, at the same time they illustrate the mischievous tendency of perverted sentiment and hardened feeling, when moved by a pretended zeal for religion, show with what resignation a truly pious mind can submit to the reproach of a malevolent accusation, and sacrifice every worldly advantage for the stern integrity of religious principle. In this respect the example of Emlyn is full of good instruction, as manifesting the power of a religious faith established on the grounds of a sincere conviction, and its ascendancy in moral purity and strength over that, which looks for its support to traditionary symbols and the consent of the multitude.

THOMAS EMLYN was born on the 27th of May, 1663, at Stamford in Lincolnshire. His father resided on a small estate in that place, which he held in his own possession, and to the management of which he was devoted. As Thomas was the only son, early and assiduous care was given to his education. At ten years of age he was sent from home, and placed at a boarding school under the charge of Mr Boheme of Walcot, with whom he continued four years.

While at this school he attended service on the sabbath at the established church. But although his parents regularly attended that church, and were then intimately acquainted with Dr Richard Cumberland, afterwards bishop of Peterborough, yet they had a leaning to the puritans, and resolved to prepare their son for fixing his destiny as a clergyman among the dissenters. Nor was it with a wish to force his inclination, or bias his sentiments, that they thus early pointed out his course for life ; it was rather in compliance with what they perceived to be the natural temper and tendency of his own mind. In the further prosecution of his studies he went to a private academy at Sulby in Northamptonshire. After residing at this place about twelve months, he made a journey to the university at Cambridge, where he was admitted into Emanuel college, at the age of sixteen. It does not appear, however, that he resided in Cambridge, for we immediately after find him again at Sulby, where he remained somewhat more than two years longer. With this institution he became dissatisfied, as not affording sufficient means of instruction to aid him in such studies as he wished to pursue, and as being deficient in the books and literary resources essential to the attainments, which his inquiring and active mind prompted him to make. In this situation he did not long deliberate, but put himself under the charge of Mr Doolittle at Islington, and accompanied that gentleman next to Clapham, and last of all to Battersea, at which place his academical education and preparatory theological studies were completed.

He now enjoyed privileges before unknown to him, both in the society and conversation of learned men, and in a free access to all kinds of books. It had never been his good fortune to be under an accomplished teacher, and even at this time his worthy instructor was more eminent for his diligence and fidelity, than for the abundance of his knowledge, or the reach and resources of his mind ; but it was at last the happiness of Emlyn to be in a condition to supply this deficiency, by the force of application, and the means of information to which he could resort. Theology engaged his close and constant attention ; he applied himself to the study with an independent and resolute spirit, not restricted in the freedom of inquiry by the trammels of the schools, nor the dogmas and theorems of subtle divines. The religion of truth and of the heart was not in his opinion so difficult a thing, that it might not be understood. To the authority of others he paid no regard, any farther than it was borne out by the plain sense of the sacred Scriptures ; and to antiquity he yielded no reverence, except as it accorded with the same standard. He determined to study, consider, and judge by the light of his own mind. With these rules to guide him, it is not strange that he should deviate from the beaten track, though it does not appear that he was aware, till sometime afterwards, to what results his love of truth and liberty would lead him.

Having gone through with the usual course of preparatory studies, he began to preach in 1682, before he was twenty years old. A few months afterwards he was recommended to the countess of Donegal, who owned large estates in the north of Ireland, but was then residing in London. Emlyn entered her family as chaplain, and went over with her to Ireland in the same capacity, when she returned the next year. The countess was married shortly after to Sir William Franklin, and the chaplain continued to hold his station in the family, where he was treated with great respect and kindness, and received a liberal allowance. So great was Sir William's esteem for him, that he offered him a valuable settlement in England, where he held an estate; but motives of conscience obliged Emlyn to decline the proffered favour; he was opposed to the principles and system of the established church, nor could any prospects of temporal aggrandisement induce him to conform to religious observances, which his sense of divine truth and duty could not approve. He remained in this family enjoying much leisure for study, as well as the benefit of enlightened society, till the year 1688, when the political troubles in the north of Ireland became somewhat alarming, and he returned to London.

To show that his refusing to accept a place in the established church was not occasioned by any narrow prejudice, or weak scrupulosity, it may be mentioned that, during his residence in Ireland, he had usually attended the service of an episcopal clergyman, and frequently officiated for him. This circumstance caused it to be rumoured, that he was coming over to the established church, but without any foundation; for although the bishop had given him a license to preach, yet he did not subscribe the articles, nor conform to any of the usages peculiar to the establishment. He obtained the license, simply because it gave him a better opportunity for usefulness in a neighbourhood, where few dissenters could be found.

During the time of his residence in the north of Ireland, he was once in Dublin, where he preached with great acceptance to a dissenting congregation, whose associate pastors were Mr Joseph Boyse and Mr Williams. Just before his departure for London he received a letter from Mr Boyse, stating that his colleague had left his charge, and inquiring whether Mr Emllyn was inclined to accept an invitation to become his successor. This inquiry our author answered in the negative, intimating that concerns of some importance demanded his presence in England. The following is an extract from his letter to Mr Boyse. "As for the rumour with you of my being addicted wholly to the church, it is so far true, that I preached once every Lord's day publicly; but you did very rightly understand me, that I had my license without ordination or subscription, for I had it without any condition, and I do not intend to take episcopal ordination, unless I could escape the subscription, or be reconciled to it, which I am not yet, nor think I shall be. But as for what concerns lay conformity with the church, I can safely dispense with it, and do not scruple to preach either in a church or meeting, both which I would make one church, notwithstanding little differences and corruptions, which I am not engaged in; and, really, however I like the meetings in themselves, I should be loth to bring any people into sufferings by keeping them from church when necessity requires, though I know this takes no place at this time, nor will, I hope, hereafter. Though I know some would call this temporising, yet I know your charity and judgment will not admit that I mean so, but that it is what my judgment allows in point of conscience, not interest." These are truly christian sentiments, and bear equal testimony to the liberal and generous spirit, and the scriptural faith of their author. Were all christians to be like minded, and to respect as sincerely the judgment and faith of their brethren, the grounds of difference would be so much narrowed, as to be hardly worth contending for by any class, which might set itself up as a party.

In Mr Emlyn's way to London he preached at Liverpool, and several other places, sometimes in the church, and at others with the dissenters. At Liverpool several persons were desirous of settling him in a vacant church, but he declined their proposal for reasons above given. After remaining in London for a short period, he complied with the urgent request of Sir Robert Rich to officiate temporarily as minister of a dissenting congregation at Leostoff, in Suffolk, where the people solicited him to become their permanent pastor. This invitation he deemed it inexpedient to accept, because he was persuaded the place was not in all respects suited to him, and he was averse to forming any connexion of this nature, which looked forward to the probability of a dissolution. This post he occupied about a year and a half, and, as in Ireland, so in England, he was on friendly terms with the episcopal clergy, uniting in acts of charity with those in his neighbourhood, and occasionally attending service in the church.

While at Leostoff an incident happened, to which may be traced the first spring of the future prominent events of his life. He became attached by a close and reciprocal friendship to Mr William Manning, a highly respectable dissenting minister in that vicinity. In love of knowledge, and an inquisitive, independent turn of mind, there was a strong resemblance between them, and it was their pleasure to pursue together certain subjects of inquiry, in which they both desired to be better informed. At this juncture appeared Dr Sherlock's work, entitled a Vindication of the Trinity, to which, from the celebrity of the author, and the interest then excited by the subject, their attention was earnestly drawn. Much to their surprise, however, they found the arguments of the learned author vastly less convincing than they had anticipated, and points, of which till then they had entertained no doubts, were now brought up before them clothed in mists and darkness, on perceiving with what ill success a powerful and zealous advocate had attempted to prove and defend them. In short, they were both driven to suspect the truth of the trinity, by reading Dr Sherlock's book in vindication of it.

They followed the subject into other channels, resorted to other authors, read the Scriptures, consulted creeds, but all in vain; they could nowhere find satisfactory proofs of a trinity. What opinion Mr Emlyn formed at that time, or whether he formed any, is not certain; he corresponded for several years with Mr Manning on the subject, but it was not till long afterwards, as will be seen, that he became professedly an Arian. He was deliberate and cautious, yielding only to the force of argument and serious conviction. Manning embraced the humanitarian system, but Emlyn always believed in the preexistence of our Saviour, and in the creation of the visible world through his agency.

He had not been two years at Leostoff, when he received another letter from Mr Boyse, pressing him to accept the invitation of the people to become his associate. With this renewed request he at length determined to comply, and went back to Dublin in May, 1691, where he was immediately settled as a colleague with Mr Boyse. In this station few events of his life for nearly ten years have been transmitted, any farther than that he was faithful in discharging the numerous duties of his office in a very large congregation, a popular, engaging, and practical preacher, abounding in the fruits of a pure benevolence and sincere piety, and adorned with the graces of an elevated, unsullied christian example. He was peculiarly earnest and happy in a style of impressive preaching, with forcible and quickening appeals to the understanding and hearts of his hearers, seldom touching on abstruse doctrines, or unedifying speculations.

The following are his own words, as contained in a letter to his friend, Mr Manning. "I meddle not with any but practicals in preaching. I begin to think, that the greatest part of controversial divinity about the covenants, and the like, is much like the various philosophical hypotheses and theories, where men in the dark are pleased with their ingenious romances, and if they can maintain that so matters may be, they soon conclude so they are and must be, without authority, which in religion must not pass. There is nothing I more sincerely desire, than right knowledge of important truths; and it is some satisfaction, that I am sure I am not biassed by interest or love of worldly esteem, and if one err unwillingly about the blessed Jesus, I should hope it may be pardoned, though it would sincerely grieve me to promote any such thing." These views he reduced to practice in the services of the sabbath, and in his religious intercourse with his parishioners, thus living most harmoniously with the people of his charge and his colleague, promoting the happiness of the former by spiritual counsels and a kind deportment, and soothing the cares of the latter not more by a participation of labours, than by a steady and devoted friendship.

But this scene was to be changed by one of the most remarkable proceedings, recorded in the history of the church. Its cause is thus briefly narrated in the plain and expressive language of the author.

“I had been a preacher in Dublin for eleven years to a congregation of protestant dissenters, who were generally a sober and peaceable people, not unworthy of my love, nor had been wanting in any testimonies of affection and respect, that I could reasonably desire or expect from them.

“I own I had been unsettled in my notions from the time I read Dr Sherlock’s book on the Trinity, which sufficiently discovered how far many had gone back toward polytheism. I long tried what I could do with some Sabellian turns, making out a trinity of somewhats in one single mind. I found that by the tretheistical scheme of Dr Sherlock and Mr Howe, I best preserved the trinity, but I lost the unity. By the Sabellian scheme of modes, and subsistencies, and properties, I kept up the divine unity, but then I had lost a trinity, such as the Scripture discovers, so that I could never keep both in view at once. But after much serious thought, and study of the Scriptures, with many concerned addresses to the Father of lights, I found great reason first to doubt, and after by degrees to alter my judgment, in relation to former received opinions of the trinity, and the supreme deity of our Lord Jesus Christ. For though the word of God was my rule, I could not tell how to understand that rule but by the use of my reason, knowing well, that he who tells me, I must lay aside my reason when I believe the Gospel, does plainly declare, that to believe is to act without reason, and that no rational man can be a Christian. I desired only to know what I must believe, and why. As to the latter I was satisfied, that divine revelation is sufficient ground of belief; but then I must conceive what it is that it reveals, and that I am explicitly to believe and profess; for a faith of sounds without meaning I understand not, and no more can believe airy sounds, than I can see them with my eyes. I could not imagine it should be necessary to say my prayers with understanding, and my creed without it; and could every whit as much edify by worship, as by belief, uttered in an unknown tongue. I did not make my reason the rule of my faith, but employed it to judge what was the meaning of that written rule or word of God; and thus was led to form notions different from what others had taught me, without regard either to Arius or Socinus, not agreeing wholly with either.

“Accordingly I was ever careful not to speak against my own judgment, or what should appear so to a judicious hearer, that I might not act against christian sincerity; and yet I never confronted the opinions of others by an express or unhandsome opposition. I doubted whether this was my duty, or was proper in the pulpit, where I could not have freedom to say all that was requisite in such a controversy; and whether I ought at once to cast myself out of my station of service, without a more particular and direct occasion given me to profess my mind, which I did apprehend would offer, and which I was determined to accept when it did."*

Such is the author's frank and candid account of the state of his mind, and of the motives by which he prevailed on himself to practise a reserve on a subject, the discussion of which, under the circumstances then existing around him, would, he was persuaded, kindle strife, discord, and heart burnings, instead of adding strength to the bonds of peace, love, unity, and good fellowship. But this wise and judicious purpose of maintaining the spirit and reality of a right christian practice, at the expense of a private opinion on a point of doubtful speculation, was at length counteracted. In the year 1701, a member of Mr Emlyn's congregation, after having listened eleven years with great delight and approbation to his preaching, began to suspect the orthodoxy of his creed, in regard to the common notions of the Trinity, and revealing his suspicion to Mr Boyse, it was agreed that they would call on him together, and make inquiry as to this particular. Mr Emlyn answered them with the utmost readiness, and explained his views at large, in which he professed it to be his faith, that God the Father is the only supreme God, and that the Son is subordinate and inferior, deriving all his excellence and authority from the Father. He added, at the same time, that, if the people were not satisfied with these terms of his faith, and any ill feelings were likely to be created among them on this account, he was ready to resign his charge, and at all events was anxious to preserve peace and good will, whatever might be the sacrifice to him.

Mr Boyse would not listen to this suggestion, but insisted that the case ought first to be brought before the Dublin ministers, and their opinion ascertained. Emlyn, knowing from experience the narrow spirit and heated zeal of these men, and knowing also that they had really no concern in the affair, was not disposed to have them consulted, but wished the whole matter to be settled, according to the true principles of christian liberty, by a mutual agreement between the people and their pastor. To gratify his associate and friend, however, he yielded to his proposition, and met the ministers at the time appointed. The result proved but too truly, that he was not deceived in his presentiment of what he had to expect at the hands of his brethren, with whom he had been for many years on terms of strong and cordial intimacy. After a conference with him of two hours, without attempting to convince him of his error, or confute the arguments by which his faith was supported, without consulting his congregation or waiting for any formal complaint from them, and even without giving him notice of their intended proceedings, this self constituted assembly of ministers passed an order, that Mr Emlyn should no longer execute the office of a preacher.

At this crisis he called several of the leading members of his society together, explained to them what had happened, and recommended that, to avoid further difficulties and animosity, a separation should take place. To this proposal they were not willing to assent, but thought it preferable that he should desist from preaching for a season, till a longer space should be given to deliberate, and some mode of reconciling differences devised. To this plan, for good reasons, he declined acceding.

It was finally concluded, that he should make a journey to England ; but here another difficulty arose. The Dublin ministers seemed now to consider Mr Emlyn a sort of state prisoner, subject to their power and command. They assumed the liberty of consulting on his intended visit to England, and after suitable deliberation finally agreed, that he should be permitted to go, enjoining it on him, however, in a special charge, that "he should not preach anywhere." This decision was communicated to him by two of their numbers in person, and in allusion to it Mr Emlyn speaks thus in his Narrative. "To this imperious message, so full of affectation of authority, and expressive of rigid Presbyterian tyranny, which was yet attended by an Independent minister as one of the messengers, I answered to this effect ; that I did not design to preach on the matters in debate where I went, if that would satisfy them ; but that they assumed too much in forbidding me to preach, who had no authority from them, nor owned any in them; that I had as much authority to forbid them to preach, as they to forbid me, and should pay no regard to them herein. Upon which they said they would then write to the London ministers about it. I bid them use their discretion, and I should use mine." In this spirited reply to the extraordinary presumption of the Dublin ministers, we find a perfect consistency in the principles and conduct of the author; he discovers himself to be a thorough advocate for liberty and justice, defending with equal pertinacity the rights and freedom of Christians, both in regulating the forms of church government, and in adopting modes of faith.

He went to England, but not to find peace, or escape the poison of slander and the arrows of persecution. His kindhearted brethren made the pulpits of Dublin resound with the cry of his apostacy, and the loud clamour of heretic and infidel became so familiar to the ear of the public, that even the wise and considerate were fain to believe what they so often heard repeated from the highest authority. The persons, who recommended his leaving the country, that his case might cause as little excitement as possible, were the first to proclaim it abroad, and call down indignation on its enormity. He had been absent but ten weeks, when he thought his presence in Dublin necessary, both that he might attend to the concerns of his family, and defend his character against the calumnies, which mistaken zeal and industrious malice had scattered so freely. While in London he was received kindly by his brethren, notwithstanding the pains taken by the Dublin ministers to make him odious wherever he appeared. In the period of his absence he wrote a short account of his case, which he published, and which has been usually printed in his works as a sequel to his Narrative.

On his arrival in Dublin he was greatly afflicted at the conduct of those, who had for many years professed to be his friends, in whose intercourse he had enjoyed much, and from whom he felt that he deserved not bitterness and reproach. "I had not been of so unsocial a nature," says he, "as not to relish the society and love of my dear friends, nor was I insensible to the pangs of a violent separation; nor yet so mortified to the world, as not to feel some difference between contempt and respect; but still, my convictions of truth were so clear, that these things never staggered my resolutions of adhering to it, in the midst of all discouragements." This declaration speaks as much for the warmth of his feelings, as for the strength of his constancy, and it was nobly verified under circumstances of heavy trial.

As soon as Mr Emlyn found himself again in Dublin, learning the extent of the misrepresentations and false sentiments which prevailed concerning his religious opinions, he resolved to draw up and publish an ample exposition of his views. This resolution he executed in a treatise entitled An Humble Inquiry into the Scripture Account of the Lord Jesus Christ. Hardly a copy of this work had gone abroad, when certain very zealous persons among the dissenters determined to have the author prosecuted. It was first contemplated to pursue the process of a presentment by the grand jury, but this was likely to be attended with so much delay, that it was abandoned. A special warrant was therefore obtained, and Mr Emlyn's rooms were entered by the keeper of Newgate, who seized him and several copies of his work, and took him before the Lord Chief Justice. Bail was at first refused, but it was finally received through the consent of the Attorney General, in the amount of eight hundred pounds for appearance at the time of trial.

When the expected time arrived, the case was not brought up, and he was bound over to another term. Even when this came round no further progress was made, than the finding a bill by the grand jury, in which an indictment of blasphemy was brought against the author. So rashly had this indictment been made out, however, and with so wanton and malignant a design, that it contained many expressions, which the author had never used. This was afterwards detected, and the bill thrown aside as defective, so that when the author appeared to take his trial, a new bill was to be made out, and the trial was put over to another term. Thus was he kept in suspense while his enemies were plotting his ruin, and devising means for carrying their purpose into effect under the artful guise of a legal prosecution ; and thus was the arm of law turned aside from its appropriate task of protecting right, innocence, and virtue, to the disgraceful work of crushing a man, whose only offence was an open avowal of what he believed to be the true faith of the Gospel, and this in an English court of justice, at the beginning of the eighteenth century, in the age of Newton, Locke, and Clarke.

Four months after the prosecution, the trial came on before the Lord Chief Justice. There were also seated on the judges' bench six or seven bishops of the established church, among whom were the archbishops of Armaugh and of Dublin. The indictment set forth, that Thomas Emlyn "being wholly moved by the instigation of the devil," was guilty of "writing and causing to be printed a certain infamous and scandalous libel," in which "he impiously, blasphemously, falsely, and maliciously asserted," that Jesus was not the supreme God, nor equal to him, and that this libel was published "with intention to disturb the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom."* Emlyn soon found,

* The work referred to here is the Humble Inquiry, and the words quoted into the indictment, as the foundation of the charge of an "infamous and scandalous libel," were the following.

"I see no reason there will be to oppose those Unitarians, who think him to be a sufficient Saviour and Prince, though he be not the only Supreme God ; nor can any with reason attempt to prove him to be such, from his works and office as king of his church, since 'tis implied, that as such he must do homage to God the Father, in delivering up his kingdom to him. And this very expression, to God the Father, makes it plain that there is no God the Son in the

that he had neither favour nor justice to expect from any quarter ; and, in fact, it had already been declared to him by a gentleman of the bar, that he would not be allowed to speak in his own behalf, and that there was a design “to run him down like a wolf without law or game.” The chief justice had been free in expressing his opinions ; and the jury was composed of persons from the illiterate classes of society, who had no knowledge of ecclesiastical subjects.

The first step in the trial was to prove that Mr Emlyn was the author of the book, in which the libel was said to be contained. No evidence of the fact appeared ; a printer made oath that he received one half sheet from him, but that he knew not who wrote it ; and Mr Boyse testified, that in the private conference with the ministers Mr Emlyn expressed sentiments similar to those contained in the book. On this testimony, which did not amount to a shadow of evidence, the Queen’s counsel raised an argument, which was urged with heat and vehemence ; and it was decided same sense, or in the same supreme essence with the Father.—So then Jesus Christ in his highest capacity being inferior to the Father, how can he be the same God to which he is subject, or of the same rank and dignity?—So that I may safely say thus much, that the blessed Jesus has declared himself not to be the Supreme God, or equal to the Father, as plainly as words could speak, or in brief express.” See Emlyn’s Narrative, in his Works, vol. I. p. 27.

These are all the passages, which were quoted to sustain the indictment for a libel and blasphemy.

that the evidence, although presumptive, was sufficiently to convict him. "This then was the method used against me," says Mr Emlyn, "first to prove what my opinions were from private discourses, at the instigation of friends, who treated with me on the foot of conscience and religion; and in the next place to raise, or at least thence to strengthen the presumption, that I wrote the book, which was agreeable to such opinions; and lastly to make this presumption serve the turn of full evidence; and this in a case, where the charge was no less than wilful and malicious blasphemy and sedition; and this too gathered only from speculative opinions."

As to the main point of the indictment, namely, whether what was written could justly be called blasphemy, the question was not discussed at all. Mr Emlyn desired much to speak on this point, and to show the extreme absurdity of the charge, on the ground both of law and the principles of christian faith and charity; and particularly to make it appear, that if his language could be branded with blasphemy, the same imputation would rest on some of the greatest and best divines in every age of the church, those even who had been accounted in the fullest measure orthodox. But the Chief Justice refused to hear him on the subject, quoting a single precedent as the law in the case, and telling the jury at the close of his charge, that "if they acquitted him the lords bishops were there," thus intimidating them with the weight of authority possessed by the persons, under whose inspection they were acting. The precedent adduced by the Chief Justice was one of a very flagrant character, in which the wicked intention of the person accused could not be doubted, and which was not in the remotest degree analogous to the case in hand, as being in no way concerned with religious faith or opinion. The worst construction, which Mr Emlyn's language could possibly admit, with any show of justice, would have been to call it heresy; but then the prosecution must have been abandoned, as heresy was not cognisable as a crime at common law. And here it may be remarked, that the indictment designated the offence to be a libel, because no crime by the name of blasphemy was known in the English law; hence the use of the phrase "blasphemous libel" in the indictment.

From what has been said, it is easy to imagine that the jury would return the verdict of guilty. Mr Emlyn was immediately committed to the common jail, where he remained till he was called up to receive sentence from the lord Chief Justice. It was ordered, that he should "suffer a year's imprisonment, pay a thousand pounds fine to the Queen, and lie in prison till paid; and find security for good behaviour during life." This sentence was accompanied with the consoling assurance of the Chief Justice, that the pillory was the punishment which he deserved, but in consequence of his being a "man of letters," he had been treated with lenity. To carry the farce still further, and expose the mockery of the whole proceeding, the Queen's counsel moved that he should retract, and thus escape the punishment. With this proposal, for a good reason, he would not comply, as his conscience bore him out in all he had done. This suggestion on the part of the counsel, however, proved the bare-faced injustice with which the whole affair had been conducted, for how was the nature of the offence to be changed in the eye of the law by retracting? When the sentence was passed, a piece of paper was fastened on his breast, and he was led round the rooms of the court, by way of making his disgrace the more conspicuous, and his affliction the more severe and cruel.

In speaking of himself Emlyn observes, "after sentence I was committed to the sheriffs of Dublin, and was a close prisoner for something more than a quarter of a year in the subsheriff's house; but upon complaint I was hastily hurried away to the common jail, where I lay among the prisoners in a close room, filled with six beds, for about five or six weeks; and then by a habeas corpus I was, upon my petition, removed into the Marshalsea for my health." As it was impossible for him to pay the fine demanded in his sentence, he remained here a prisoner for more than two years, visited by none of his former brethren among the clergy of Dublin, except Mr Boyse. This gentleman was always his friend, although by the popular voice and influence he was moved sometimes to act with less discretion and firmness, than could have been desired.

Emlyn's friends in England and Ireland interceded to have his fine reduced ; at first there appeared no hope of success, but after a petition to the lord chancellor, he decided that "such exorbitant fines were against law," and the thousand pounds were in the end reduced to seventy, which sum was paid into the Queen's treasury. This was not all, however, for the archbishop of Dublin demanded in addition a shilling on the pound as the Queen's almoner, and he insisted that this amount should be paid on the original fine. He relaxed a little at last, after much altercation, and consented to take twenty pounds as a compromise for the whole. Emlyn was then released from prison, having given bonds for his good behaviour through life. This was on the 21st of July, 1705, and he went immediately to England, never again returning to the country where he had endured such unparalleled scenes of trial, suffering, and danger.

During his imprisonment he occupied himself with writing some of the pieces, which have since been published, and also in preaching on the sabbath in a large room, hired by him for the purpose. His audience consisted of such of the prisoners as were allowed to attend him, and a few persons of his former congregation, who were willing to brave the popular odium that they might profit by his instructions, and prove the affection with which they still regarded their former spiritual guide, even in the midst of his bonds.

Arrived in London he was soon employed to preach to a small congregation collected for this object. To this service he was devoted several years, receiving very little compensation, till by death and other incidents the congregation was dissolved. His being suffered to preach in London gave offence to a few, who made extraordinary professions of orthodoxy, and a formal complaint was carried to Dr Tenison, archbishop of Canterbury. But he knew the character of Emlyn, and was too wise and too charitable to molest him, notwithstanding the lower house of convocation represented it to the Queen as a grievance, that "weekly sermons were preached in defence of the unitarian principles." Mr Charles Leslie attacked Emlyn in a public manner, and complained that he should be permitted to preach. A controversy on certain theological points was for a time kept up between them, in which our author was particularly successful in elucidating and defending his sentiments. Leslie had talents, but a slender stock of theological knowledge; he had a furious zeal and dogmatical temper; he was boisterous and sarcastic; but he had little of the meekness of a christian, and less of those moral refinements of character so necessary in a fair and serious disputant.

Being thus retired from his ministerial charge, Emlyn preached no more except occasionally by invitation to a Baptist society at Barbican. He lived cheerfully and contentedly in retirement, deriving a sufficient income from his small fortune to supply his wants, and make him independent of the world. On the death of the celebrated Mr Peirce of Exeter, about the year 1726, it was in agitation by the people of his society to ask Mr Emlyn to become his successor ; but when our author heard of this movement, he requested them not to proceed, as there were weighty reasons, considering his advancing age and infirm health, why it would not be expedient for him to accept their invitation.

He formed an intimate acquaintance with Dr Samuel Clarke, who, as soon as he learnt the purity and disinterestedness of his character, treated him with marked kindness, and as a most confidential friend. For many years he seldom undertook or meditated any important project, without consulting Mr Emlyn, and asking his advice. Our author has rendered a just and affectionate tribute for these acts of friendship and confidence, in a short memoir of Dr Clarke, in which he has explained and triumphantly defended some points in the character of this truly pious, great, and learned man, against the suspicions of jealousy, and the calumnies of open hostility. Among the great and the good, who adorned the age in which he lived, few can be placed on a higher eminence than Dr Clarke.

In the latter stages of his life, Emlyn felt severely the burden of declining years, but his mind continued vigorous, his spirit cheerful, and his religious affections lively and ardent. He wrote and studied, till this exercise became a weariness, and then his hours were passed, at the intervals of bodily pain, either in the conversation of friends, or in drawing materials for pious and grateful reflection from the inexhaustible resources of his own mind. He always spoke with the greatest satisfaction of the joy he felt in his religious opinions, and to his last hour praised God, that he had been pleased to open his mind to those truths, which the Saviour came into the world to reveal and publish for the good of man, and which he believed were the only true grounds of the sinner's hope. The last day of his life was serene and happy; not one lingering desire clung to the world; the hour had come and he was ready; full of gratitude for the past, and of humble confidence in the future, he looked forward with an eye of faith, that brightened and caught new beams of joy, as the taper of life faded, decayed, and expired. His spirit departed on the 30th of May, 1741, in the seventy ninth year of his age.

The narrative of the persecutions suffered by this excellent man is not without its benefit, even in our age; not that the recurrence of such a scene needs be apprehended; but it is of eminent use for us to know the value of our religious privileges, and, what is more, to be prepared to maintain them against the usurpation of power, and the lawless ravings of fanaticism; for power will always usurp, bigotry will always rule with a tyrant's rod, and while the sun shall last and the stars shine in the firmament, fanaticism will burn, and blast, and destroy. The reviving spirit of human improvement will do something to temper the rage of false zeal, and make religion worthy of the God who gave, and of the rational beings who profess it. How much, indeed, has it not done since the trial of Emlyn? Where is the dark corner of the civilised protestant world, in which such a blot on the face of society, such an insult to the majesty of law, and such violence to the rights of nature, would now be endured? The spirit, however, which prompts to an outrage like this, is not easily extinguished; when public sentiment makes it ashamed to appear in open day, and the stern sway of justice shortens the arm of its power, then it works in secret, it whispers of heresies that are abroad, and taints the passing breezes with the poison of slander. It is not changed in its nature, but only in the mode of its operation; it does not imprison, gibbet, and burn the body; it resorts to a different, but not less certain mode of ruining its victim; it seeks to undermine reputation, and to fix a stigma on character, and to stamp honest opinion with crime, by sounding the trumpet of alarm with the loud, harsh, ominous notes of heresy, infidelity, and irreligion, in the ears of the credulous multitude, till their minds are shocked at the fearful discord, and every good feeling is banished from the heart to make room for lurking suspicion, or to wake from their slumbers the devouring fires of passion.

Now under whatever forms this spirit, so hostile to truth, virtue, and religion, may show itself, whether it aims to devour the body and substance, or blast the character, it equally behooves every friend of the public good and of true christianity to be on his guard against it. When the Chief Justice sentenced Emlyn to imprisonment and fine for no other offence, than that of conscientious opinion, he represented to him the mercy of this sentence, by telling him, that if he had been in Portugal or Spain, his mildest punishment would have been burning. Persecution may always use this argument. Unhappily, examples will not be wanting to sanction any enormity. Let the examples be forgotten, or cast off as a reproach to the history of man; let this presumption, which assumes authority over another's faith, be resisted, till it shall no longer have the power, if it have the will, to meddle, usurp, and oppress; let every christian feel, that he has no dearer right than the liberty of conscience, and let him be at least as ready to show the purity of his faith, by the convincing argument of a good life, as by the tenacity with which he holds to the dark, intricate, and unintelligible dogmas of a long and ancient creed, woven in the web of a senibarbarous philosophy and perverted metaphysics, when

‘ For dubious meanings learn’d polemics strove,
 And wars on faith prevented works of love ;
 The brands of discord far around were hurl’d,
 And holy wrath inflam’d a sinful world.’

Bishop Hoadly’s remarks in reference to the case of Emlyn, written ten or twelve years after the event, may with propriety be quoted here. They are contained in his ironical Dedication to the Pope, which was prefixed to Sir Richard Steele’s Account of the State of the Roman Catholic Religion. Hoadly tells the Pope, with what facility the protestants could manage to set up a prosecution of their brethren, who differ from them, notwithstanding they have abjured the authority exercised by his holiness’ church in passing judgment on others in matters of faith ; and this, he adds, is not confined to the national church of England, but is equally the delight of dissenters, when a proper occasion offers. He then goes on to say,

“ This hath been experienced, particularly in Ireland, by one who could not see exactly what they saw about the nature of Christ, before his appearance in the world. For, as with you, a man had better blaspheme Almighty God, than not magnify the blessed virgin, so with many of us, it is much more innocent and less hazardous to take from the glory of the Father, than of his Son. Nay, to bring down the Father to a level with his own Son is a commendable work, and the applauded labour of many learned men of leisure ; but to place the Son below his own Father in any degree of real perfection, this is an unpardonable error ; so unpardonable that all hands were united against that unhappy man ; and he found, at length, that he had much better have violated all God's commandments, than have interpreted some passages of Scripture differently from his brethren. The Nonconformists accused him, the Conformists condemned him, the Secular Power was called in, and the cause ended in an imprisonment and a very great fine ; two methods of conviction about which the Gospel is silent."*

The writings of Emlyn were collected and published in three volumes octavo, a fourth edition of which appeared in the year 1746. The first volume contains a memoir of the life of the author, written by Sollom Emlyn, to which is added an appendix comprising Emlyn's own narrative of the proceedings against him at Dublin. In this volume are also found the Humble Inquiry, five other Tracts chiefly of a controversial nature in reply to Mr Boyse, Dr Waterland, Dr Sherlock, Dr Willis, and others, and also a treatise on Baptism. In the second volume are the remarks on Leslie's writings against Unitarians, an inquiry into the authenticity of the celebrated text of the three heavenly witnesses in John, together with an answer to Mr Martin's dissertation on this subject, and also four other tracts, and a brief memoir of the life and sentiments of Dr Samuel Clarke. The third volume is composed wholly of sermons.

* See the whole of this ingenious Dedication in the first volume of the present Collection of Essays and Tracts, p. 255. In the life of Emlyn, prefixed to his works, this Dedication is ascribed to Sir Richard Steele ; but this is a mistake, the cause of which may be learnt by consulting the volume here referred to , p. 247.

The Humble Inquiry, selected for publication in the present work, is a fair specimen of Mr Emlyn's mode of thinking, his powers of reasoning, and style of composition. To explain and convince is in every part the obvious purpose of the author, and his main effort is to come to the argument with the fewest words, and by the shortest course. A clearer exposition of his opinions, and a more natural and connected chain of reasoning to support them, could not well be imagined.

His examination of Leslie's dialogue relating to the Satisfaction of Jesus Christ, is one of the best treatises on this subject, which has been written. The difficulties of the satisfaction scheme are set forth in their proper dimensions, and pressed with a powerful weight of argument drawn from the nature of rewards and punishments, the Scriptures, and the character of the Supreme Being.

The Inquiry into the Original Authority of the Text, 1 John v. 7, concerning the three heavenly witnesses, is a performance of very great merit, considering the time in which it was produced. It was among the first which appeared on that side of the question, for although Sir Isaac Newton's great argument had been written, and sent in manuscript to Le Clerc in Holland some time before, yet it was not known to the public till nearly thirty years afterwards. Emlyn proves himself thoroughly master of the subject, as far as the means of knowledge were then within his reach, and although he does not discover the same profound logic as Sir Isaac Newton, nor the same astonishing compass of learning and exuberance of wit as the gigantic Porson in his reply to Travis, yet he selects and combines his materials with a skillful hand, and reasons closely and conclusively. Mr Martin, minister of the French church at Utrecht, wrote in defence of the Text, and a controversy ensued between him and Mr Emlyn.

The Sermons of our author are chiefly remarkable for their plainness of style, vigour of thought and expression, clearness of method, directness of manner, and their strictly practical tendency. One sermon in the volume, entitled Funeral Consolations, written immediately after the death of his wife in Dublin, has been often commended as one of the rarest examples of this species of composition in the language, showing the happy union of deep feeling at a most afflictive loss, with the calm resignation of a firm and pious mind to the will of Providence.

The other tracts in these volumes are of more or less value, according to the subjects on which they treat. Some of them had a temporary object, and consequently a temporary interest ; but there are very few from which instruction may not be derived to the student in theology at the present day. It was the author's fortune to be driven into controversy, but he never lost his temper, nor descended to recrimination; his retorts were not pointed with sarcasm, nor his pleasantries with malice; his victory was that of argument; his triumph was the conviction of an honest mind, resolved to defend itself against the assaults of hardened injustice, and in all seasons to be the unwearied champion of truth, right, liberty, and religion.

INTO THE SCRIPTURE ACCOUNT
JESUS CHRIST ; OR A SHORT ARGUMENT CONCERNING HIS DEITY AND GLORY ACCORDING TO THE GOSPEL.

CHAPTER I.

SECTION I.

The Term God is used in Scripture in different Senses, supreme and subordinate.

THAT the blessed Jesus has the title of God ascribed sometimes to him in the holy Scriptures, is not denied by Arians or Socinians ; but it remains to be examined in what sense that character, as given to him, is intended. Nor is this an unreasonable or needless inquiry, since it is beyond all reasonable denial, that the title of God is given in very different senses in the Scripture.

1. Sometimes it signifies the most High, Perfect, and Infinite Being, who is of himself alone, and owes neither his being nor authority, nor anything to another ; and this is what is most commonly intended, when we speak of God in ordinary discourse, and in prayer and praise ; we mean it of God in the most eminent sense.

2. At other times it has a lower sense, and is made the character of persons who are invested with subordinate authority and power from that supreme Being. Psalm xcvi. 7. Thus Angels are styled Gods, Psalm viii. 5. "Thou hast made him a little lower than the Gods," as it is in the margin. So magistrates are Gods, Exod. xxii. 28. Psalm lxxxii. 1. John x. 34, 35. And sometimes in the singular number, one person is styled God, as Moses is twice so called, a God to Aaron, and afterwards a God to Pharaoh ; Exod. iv. 16 ; vii. 1 ; and thus the devil is called the God of this world, that is, the prince and mighty ruler of it ; though by unjust usurpation, and God's permission. Now as he who alone is God, in the former sense, is infinitely above all these ; so we find him distinguished from all others, who are called God, by this character, viz. a God of Gods, or the chief of all Gods, with whom none of those Gods may be compared.* So Philo describes him to be not only the God of men, but the God of Gods also. This is the highest and most glorious epithet given him in the Old Testament, when it is designed to make a most magnificent mention of his peerless greatness and glory. Equivalent to this, I take that title to be, which is so much used in the New Testament, viz. the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the God of our Lord Jesus, the Father of glory. For since Jesus Christ is the chief of all subordinate powers, the Prince of the kings of the earth, and far above the greatest angels; the Lord of Lords, and King of Kings; he who is styled the God of our Lord Jesus Christ is therein, in effect, styled the God of Gods, or above all Gods. Eph. i. 3, 17. Rev. i. 5. Eph. i. 21.

Now the question to be resolved is, in which of these two senses Christ is said to be God in the holy Scriptures? The bare character of God determines nothing in this case, because it belongs both to the supreme and to subordinate beings in power and authority; but the question is, whether Jesus Christ be "the God of Gods," or above all gods?

He is indeed the Lord of Lords; but that denotes an inferior character, compared with that of God of Gods, as appears by 1 Cor. viii. 5, though it be included in the superior; so that he who is above all Gods, is also over all Lords, but not contrariwise.*

* To this purpose are the words of that eminent philosopher Sir Isaac Newton in his Optics, p. 314, 315. Lat. Edit. "The word Deity imports exercise of dominion over subordinate beings, and though the word God most frequently signifies Lord, yet every Lord is not a God. The exercise of dominion in a spiritual being constitutes a God; if that dominion be real, that being is a real God; if it be fictitious, a false God; if it be supreme, the supreme God." He might have added, if subordinate, a subordinate God.

In short, has Jesus Christ any God over him, who has greater authority, and greater ability than himself, or not? This will decide the matter; for if he have a God above him, then is he not the absolutely supreme God, though in relation to created beings he may be a God (or Ruler) over all †.

SECTION II.

Our Lord Jesus Christ speaks of Another as God, distinct from Himself, and owns this God to be above or over Him.

NOR can we more clearly demonstrate this point, than by showing; First, that Jesus Christ expressly speaks of another God than himself; Secondly, that he owns this God to be above or over himself; Lastly, that he wants those supereminent and infinite perfections, which belong only to the Lord God of Gods. Of these I shall treat in a manner suited to vulgar capacities; for I judge it very unfit to speak or write of important articles, (which the common people must believe, and must so far understand,) in such a manner as leaves them wholly unintelligible.

† Is not he alone the one God, who knows no superior, no cause of his existence, whom the Son himself teaches us to esteem the only true God, and confesses to be greater than himself, even his God? Euseb. de Eccles. Theol. l. 1. c. 11. See also Irenæus, l. 3 c. 18. who frequently distinguishes the Father by this character, The God over whom there is no other God.

First, Our Lord Jesus Christ expressly speaks of another God distinct from himself. Several times we find him saying, "My God," of another, Mat. xxvii. 46. "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" So John xx. 17. Sure he intended not to say, Myself, Myself, why hast thou forsaken me? This God then was distinct from himself, as he declares in other places; John vii. 17. "He shall know my doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." So John viii. 42, where it is to be noted, that he does not distinguish himself from him, as the Father, but as God; and, therefore, in all just construction, he cannot be supposed to be that selfsame God, from whom he distinguishes, and to whom he opposeth himself. How manifestly are the one God and the one Lord distinguished, 1 Cor. viii. 6? And that there may be no just pretence to say with Placæus, that the God and the Lord, or the cause of which all things are, and the cause by or through which they are, are but two things said of the same one God; we may see them more clearly distinguished, Eph. iv. 5, 6, where, by the interposing other things between the one Lord, and one God, viz. one faith, one baptism, it appears evidently, that these were not intended as two characters of the same being. I think that none, who impartially attends to the Scripture history, can doubt whether God, and his Christ, are not two distinct beings.

Secondly, Our Lord Jesus owns, not only another than himself to be God, but also that he is above or over himself, which is plainly intimated also by his Apostles. Himself loudly proclaims his subjection to the Father in many instances; in general he declares his "Father to be greater than he;" he says, he came not in his own, but in his Father's name or authority; that he sought not his own, but God's glory, nor made his own will, but God's, his rule; John xiv. 28; x. 29; John v. 43, and in such a posture of subjection "he came down from heaven" into this earth; John vi. 38, so that it should seem, that nature which did pre-exist, did not possess the supreme will, even before it was incarnate. Again, he owns his dependence upon his God and Father, even from those things which it is pretended belong to him as God, viz. the power of working miracles, of raising the dead, of executing universal judgment; of all which he says, "Of my own self I can do nothing." John v. 19, 20. 26, 27. 30. In like manner his Apostles declare his subjection to another, not only as his Father, but as his God; which is emphatically expressed, in calling the most blessed God, "the God of our Lord Jesus," after his humiliation was over, Eph. i. 17; and the "head of Christ is God," 1 Cor. xi. 3. They declare his headship over the universe, and the very foundations of his claim to honour and service, to be owing to the gracious gift of God, Phil. ii. 9, ἐχαρίσατο αὐτῷ; and yet these are some of the highest glories of Jesus Christ.

Let me only add under this head that great text, so full of irresistible evidence for proving an inferiority in the Son to his Father, or to God, 1 Cor. xv. from verse 24 to 29, where the Apostle says several things to this purpose.

1. That all things are to be "put under Christ's feet;" all enemies and powers are to be subdued to him, but adds, that it is manifest God must be excepted out of these things, that are under him; and that for this reason, because it is he who did put all under him. And how comes it to pass, that it is so evident a thing, that another must be supposed to be the great author of this triumph of Christ? Why might it not be done by himself independently, if the supreme God? And then there needs have been no exception of any one Being out of the all things under him. But the Apostle knew that Jesus Christ must needs triumph by a power derived from God, to whom it was most eminently to be ascribed; and then to one who had such thoughts, it was manifest that there must be one excepted from the all things under him, because he must needs be above Christ, who enables him to subdue all things, or makes him a God over all.

2. The Son shall "deliver up his kingdom to God, even the Father," that is, not to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, as some pretend, but to the Father only; since it was the Father who "gave him all power in heaven and earth," and who made him

“King in Zion.” Matth. xxviii 18. Psal. cx. 1 and 2. Ephes. i. 22. Heb. ii. 8. Into his hands he will make a surrender of all, in testimony of his having done all in a subordination to him; and having acted and ruled in a dependence on him, who shall have a satisfactory account of all given to him in the end. This is a glory peculiar to the Father as supreme.

3. “Then the Son himself shall be subject to him that put all things under him,” that is, to God his Father, that “God may be all in all;” that is, his subjection shall be then manifested by an open solemn acknowledgment of it, when he shall recognise the supremacy of the Father in that public act of surrender; so that though formerly, (in the present state,) all judgment and rule was committed to the Son; yet then it shall be otherwise, and God will more immediately appear in the government of the future state, which shall not be so much shared, probably between him and the Redeemer, as the present administration appears to be. This then will be the issue of all our disputes; God all in all, and the Son himself subject under him. Can anything be more expressive of an inequality between God and Christ?

But it will be said by some, that by the Son here is meant the Son of Man, or Christ as Man; while as God he shall not be subjected to the Father.

Answer. As there is no intimation of any such distinction between the pretended two natures of the Son here; so there is enough in the words to shew, that they are spoken of him, under his highest capacity and character, insomuch, that Monsieur Claude maintains it to be true of the Son of God, as to his (supposed) divine nature. But though there is no need of supposing such a nature, which I think the text plainly contradicts, yet his reasons will hold so far, as to prove the words do speak of Christ, under the highest character he bears, by the name of Son. For, first, as he says, it is not said the Son of Man but the Son absolutely, which he thinks in the Scripture use is wont to mean more than the Son of man; and undoubtedly it imports all that comes under that title; nay more, it is said even the Son himself, with great emphasis; that is, as great and glorious as he is with all his grandeur and power, he himself shall be subject. Secondly, his subjection being opposed to his reign, both must be understood of the same subject; be sure the delivering up the kingdom can only be done by the same to which it was committed, and by which it was managed. Now I shall allow, that only in his human nature, Christ could give up his kingdom; but then it is because it is as man delegated, and inhabited by God, that he sways and manages this kingdom.

And if this be allowed, as I think it needs must, that the Man Christ is sufficient, by help from God, to manage his universal spiritual kingdom, I see no reason there will be to oppose those Unitarians, who think him to be a sufficient Saviour and Prince, though he be not the only supreme God; nor can any, with reason, attempt to prove him to be such, from his works and office as king of his church, since it is implied, that as such he must do homage to God the Father, in delivering up his kingdom to him. And this very expression, to God the Father, makes it plain, that there is no God the Son in the same sense, or in the same supreme essence with the Father; because, if there were, then he ought not to be excluded from his glory of having such open homage paid to him, which is here appropriated to the Father only. And since the Apostle speaks of the same God, (whom he explains to be the Father,) to the end of this discourse, and says he shall be all in all, how evidently does he shew him to be far beyond all that are not God the Father, whatever character else they bear? So then, Jesus Christ, in his highest capacity, being inferior to the Father, how can he be the same God, to which he is subject, or of the same rank and dignity?

Thus it appears that Christ is so God, as to be under a superior God, who has set him over all. And suitable to this is that account, which the Scripture gives us of the Godhead of the blessed Jesus, viz. because he is invested with a godlike authority and power from the supreme God his Father. Thus, when he was accused by the captious Jews for assuming the character of the Son of God, John x. 35, 36, which they perversely would stretch, as though it implied an equality with God, he explains in what sense only he justified it, viz. as one whom the Father had sanctified, that is, called to a greater office, and honoured with a higher commission than those magistrates, on whom the Scripture so freely bestows the title of Gods. So when he is called God, it is explained in what sense, or of what sort of God. Heb. i. 8, 9. It is to be understood, by saying, that his God, (intimating that he had a God over him,) had anointed him with oil, &c. that is, had invested him with royal power and dignity, (as kings were installed in their office, by anointing with oil, among the Jews,) which is an explication of his Godhead or dominion. And this is said to be above his fellows, not sure above the Father and Holy Spirit, (which only are pretended to be his fellows, as God, by them who understand it of the supreme Godhead,) but above all other subordinate powers. This is one plain scripture account of his being called God, for these things are spoken to him, and of him, under the character of God; "O God, thy throne," &c. I think men should be well assured on what grounds they go, before they assign other reasons of this character, so different from the Scripture account. Let it suffice us, that God hath "made him both Lord and Christ;" Acts ii. 36. that he has "exalted him to be a Prince and Saviour." Acts v. 31.

However, our adversaries will gain nothing by alleging texts to prove the title of God to be given to Christ, since that may be; and yet it will not prove him to be the supreme independent God, but only one, who is inhabited, and commissioned, and enabled by him who is so. As to that place, which is corruptly rendered in our translation, "he thought it no robbery to be equal with God;" Phil. ii. 6. it is confessed by our adversaries themselves, that it should be read thus, viz. that he did not assume, or arrogate, or snatch at an equality with God, or covet to appear in the likeness of God;* the words are never known to be used in any other sense, as is shewn by Dr Tillotson in his Discourses against the Socinians; also by Dr Whitby in his exposition on that place; and others.† So that this rather denies than asserts Christ's equality to God, though he was in the form of God, as that notes the outward resemblance of him in his mighty power and works, which is the constant meaning of the word form in the New Testament.

But because some think such perfections are in Scripture ascribed to Christ, as will prove him to be

* One reason, why I think, what we render, to be equal with God, may be translated to be like God, is, that the word ἴσος admits degrees of comparison, ἰστέρος, ἰσάτατος. Now a strict arithmetical equality consists in an exact point; and no things can be more or less equal, than what exactly are so; but things may be more or less alike; and therefore though things that be alike, may be equal, yet they are not hereby proved, or expressed to be so. See Dr Whitby in locum, who instances in several places, where the word ἴσος is so used. T. E.

God in the highest sense, I proceed to show in the next place,

Thirdly, That our blessed Lord Jesus disclaims those infinite perfections which belong only to the supreme God of Gods. And it is most certain, that if he want one, or any of these perfections, that are essential to the Deity, he is not God in the chief sense; and if we find him disclaiming the one, he cannot challenge the other; for to deny himself to have all divine perfections, or to deny himself to be the infinite God, is the same thing.

CHAPTER II.

SECTION I.

Our Lord Jesus disclaims those infinite Perfections which belong only to the Supreme God. 1. Undeived Power. 2. Absolute Goodness. 3. Unlimited Knowledge.

FIRST, One great and peculiar perfection of the Deity is absolute, undeived omnipotence; he, who cannot work all miracles, and do whatever he list of himself, without help from another, can never be the supreme Being, or God; because he appears to be a defective being, comparatively, since he needs help, and can receive additional strength from another than himself.

Now it is most evident, that our Lord Jesus, whatever power he had, confesses again and again, that he had not infinite power of himself. "Of myself I can do nothing." John v. 30. He had been speaking of great miracles, viz. raising the dead, and executing all judgment; but all along takes care men should know that his sufficiency for these things was of God the Father. In the beginning of the discourse, he says, "The Son can do nothing but what he sees the Father do;" John v. 19. So in the middle, "The Father has given to the Son to have life in himself"; ver. 26, 27. And as if he could never too much inculcate this great truth, he adds towards the conclusion, "I can do nothing of myself," αὐτῷ ἐμαυτοῦ; or, from nothing that is my self do I draw this power and authority. Sure, this is not the voice of God, but of a man! For the Most High can receive from none; he cannot be made more mighty, or wise, because to absolute perfection can be no addition. Rom. xi. 35. And since power in God is an essential perfection; it follows, that if it be derived, then so is the essence or being itself; which is blasphemy against the Most High, for it is to ungod him; to number him among dependent derivative beings; whilst the supreme God indeed is only he, who is the first cause, and absolute original of all.

Nay, further, our Lord considers himself here in opposition to his Father; who, he says, gave him all power. Now if he had such an eternal divine Word, united more nearly to him than the Father, surely he would have owned his power to be from that Word or divine Son.

How comes he to ascribe nothing to that, since it is supposed to be equal in power to the Father himself, and more nearly allied to Jesus Christ, as the operating principle in him? "My Father in me does the works;" John xiv. 10, by which it is evident there was no divine agent in and with him, but the Father; he only has all power of himself, and needs no assistance.

Secondly; another infinite perfection, that must needs be in the Deity, is supreme absolute goodness. All nations have consented to this, by the light of nature; that Τ' ἀγαθόν, and optimus maximus, are the prime characters of the Supreme; as the orator says, he is one, quo nec melius, nec majus concipi potest; the fullest, and highest of all that are called good; for indeed all other good is derived from him.

Now the Lord Jesus expressly disclaims this character. "Jesus said to him, Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, that is God;" Matt. xix. 17, where it is most evident that he distinguishes himself from God, as not the same with him, and denies of himself what he affirms of God;* and as to that divine perfection of supreme infinite goodness, he challenges the man for presuming to say what seemed to attribute it to him, and leads him off to another, who and who only was more eminently so.

It is astonishing to see what violence is offered to the sacred text, by such as maintain the equality of Jesus Christ to God his Father. What a strange fetch is it, to suppose our Lord's meaning to be this? "I know, man, thou dost not take me for God, as I am; why then dost thou give me the title belonging to him only?" when there is not one word in the context looking this way; for Christ never challenges the poor man with this, that he thought too meanly of him, as they suppose, but quite contrary, that he thought or spake too highly of him. And verily if the man's error lay in this, that he thought too meanly of Christ, whilst his words otherwise were justly enough applied to him; I cannot think our Lord would have rebuked him in that manner; for instead of keeping him still to the right object, and rectifying his apprehensions about it, which only were wrong, he seems clearly to carry him off to another from himself, as not the right object, without rectifying his thoughts of Christ at all. And to what end could Christ reprove him in such a way, as never tells him what was his fault, but rather tempts him to run into another, and leads him out of the way?

It should seem rather, if any such notion had been then conceived by any, that the man did think him to be God; for if he thought him to be the supreme good, that was to make him God in his eye; and if he did not intend so much, but only meant it of an inferior good, how could Christ rebuke him for it, since that was no fault or error? And truly they, who say Christ's receiving worship when on earth proves his deity, can hardly give an account why the man should give, or Christ receive worship from him, as he did, Mark x. 17, if he did not take him for God. However, whatsoever the man thought, he says what Jesus Christ thought was only proper to be said of God, and too much to be said of himself, as the obvious sense of his words declares.

And let me add, that if our Lord Jesus had on purpose left the matter disguised, not willing to discover who he was then; yet it is strange that the Evangelists, who many years after relate the matter, when it was necessary to have it believed that Christ was supreme God, as it is pretended; that they, I say, should not unriddle the matter, by inserting some cautious clause, as that this he said to prove him, or because he knew he denied his Godhead, or the like; for sometimes on less occasions they enter such cautions, John vi. 6. xxi. 23. And yet though three of the Evangelists relate this discourse, they all do it the same way, and not one of them says a tittle to direct us to this secret way of interpretation, but leaves us to the hazard of a most fatal mistake, even recommended to us by his history, if Jesus Christ were indeed the supreme Good in as high a sense as God his Father, which he so apparently here denies, and by that denies himself to be the most high God.

Thirdly ; I will only add one perfection more, viz. absolute Omniscience, or unlimited knowledge of all things, past, present, and to come, Ps. cxlvii. 5. "His understanding is infinite." So Isa. xli. 23. Acts xv. 18. "Known to God are all his works from the beginning."

Now, it is plain our Lord Jesus Christ had not this infinite knowledge, particularly not of future things, such as the day of judgment. Mark xiii. 32, he says, "Of that day knows no man, no, not the Angels of heaven, nor the Son, but the Father only." Here the Son professes his knowledge to be limited, and inferior to the Father's, that is, the Son of the Father, or Son of God ; the Son as above angels in knowledge, the Son in the most eminent sense.* Now how is it possible the Son can be God infinite, and yet have but a finite understanding ? Or can he be equal in knowledge to the Father, and yet not know as much as the Father ? And be sure if he was not an infinite God, when on earth, he cannot be such afterwards. Thus we have seen Christ himself, with his own mouth disclaiming infinite original power, goodness, and knowledge to belong to him, but he attributes them to his Father only as another, distinct from himself, from whom he derived of each in a dependent limited manner.

* Irenæus, l. ii. c. 28.

SECTION II.

The Weakness and Absurdity of the Common Evasion from the Distinction of two Natures.

What can be said against these plain arguments? I imagine our opposers have but one shift left for the evading them, and that is a distinction, which serves them in all cases; for they say, Jesus Christ speaks these things of himself, as man only, while he had another nature as God, which he reserved, and excepted out of the case. So that when he says, I cannot do thus myself, or I am not to be called the chief good, or do not know this, &c. according to them, the meaning is, I have not these perfections in my human nature; but yet I know and can do all unassisted, and am the chief good in my divine nature, which also is more properly myself. The vanity of which subterfuge I intend now to lay open, by shewing how absurdly this distinction of the two natures is pretended, to take off the force of such expressions from Christ's own mouth, which in their natural and undisguised appearance do proclaim his inferiority to God, even the Father. And I shall dwell the more upon this, because it is the most popular and common evasion, and comes in at every turn, when all other relief fails.

It would be no unreasonable demand to ask, what intimation of any such distinction of two natures they can point us to, in any of these discourses of Christ? Why should men devise or imagine for him such a strange, and seemingly deceitful way of speaking from no ground, nor necessity, other than that of upholding their own precarious opinion? But I have several remarks to make upon this common answer.

1. That which in the first place I have to object against it is, that our blessed Lord Jesus Christ, if himself was the supreme God in any nature of his own, could not have said such things, as I conceive, in any consistency with truth and sincerity, (which he always maintained strictly,) he could not say himself could not do, or did not know the thing, which all this while himself could do, and did know very well, as be sure if he was the supreme God, he could and did; for this were to make him say what is most false, and to equivocate in the most deceitful manner; for though we should suppose he consisted of two infinitely distant natures, and so had two capacities of knowledge, &c. yet since himself includes them both, it follows, that the denying a thing of himself in absolute terms, without any limitation in the words or other obvious circumstances, does plainly imply a denial of its belonging to any part of his person, or any nature in it. For though we may affirm a thing of a person, which belongs only to a part of him; as I may properly say a man is wounded or hurt, though it be only in one member, suppose an arm; yet I cannot justly deny a thing of him which belongs only to one part, because it belongs not to another; as I cannot say a man is not wounded, because though one arm be shot or wounded, yet the other is whole.

For instance, I have two organs of sight, two eyes. Now suppose I converse with a man with one eye shut and the other open; if being asked whether I saw him, I should dare to say I saw him not, without any limitation, meaning to myself, that I saw him not with the eye which was shut, though still I saw him well enough with the eye which was open; I fear I should bear the reproach of a liar and deceiver, notwithstanding such a mental reservation as some would attribute to the Holy Jesus. For knowledge is the eye of the person; Jesus Christ is supposed to have two of these knowing capacities; the one weak, the other strong and piercing, that discerns all things. Mat. xxiv. 3. Now as such an one, the disciples repair to him and ask him, when the end of the world and time of his coming shall be? He answers them, by giving them some general account of the matter, but says that the particular day and hour he knew not, nor did any know but the Father, meaning, say my opposers, that he knew it not with his human knowledge, though he knew it well enough with his divine, at the same time that he said, the Son knows it not, absolutely and indefinitely.

And yet if Jesus Christ had a divine knowledge and nature, no doubt his disciples, who, if any body, must be supposed to believe it, directed the question to that, rather than to the imperfect human capacity; and yet in answer to it he says, he knew not the day, which would not be counted sincerity or truth in men, much less was Jesus Christ in danger of it; in his mouth no guile was; let us not impute it to him.

That you may see this is fair reasoning, hear how some of the other side own it, when out of the heat of this controversy. See Dr Stillingfleet's sermon on Mat. x. 16, speaking of the equivocations of Popish priests, whose common answer, when examined about what they have known by confession, is, that they know it not, which they think to vindicate from the charge of lying by saying, that "in confession, the priest knows matters as God, not as man, and therefore he denies to know them, meaning it as man." But, says the Doctor, this is absurd; because to say he does not know, is as much as to say he doth not any way know. Now if this be a good answer against the Papists, as no doubt it is; then sure it is so in the present case. Therefore, when Christ says he knows not the day of judgment, it is as much as to say he does not any way know it, and consequently, it is a vain shift to say, it was as man only. We must beware lest we bring the holy Jesus under such a reproach for equivocation, as the Romish priests lie under; and make the Jesuits themselves think they have a good title to that name, by imitating herein his example, which in this very instance they allege with so great advantage, according to this interpretation.

2. As a farther evidence, that Jesus Christ intended no such distinction of two natures, as is pretended; it is to be observed, that he puts not the distinction, or opposition between the Son of Man, and the eternal Word, as some speak, but between the Son and his Father, Mark xiii. 32; "Not the Son knows, but only the Father;" by which it is plain, he had no thought of including any person or nature of his own among the excepted; for whatever was not the Father, he says was ignorant of that day. Now it is certain, that in no nature was the Son the Father; and consequently where none but the Father knows, none, who is not the Father, can be intended; and since our Lord was making an exception in the case, he would not have forgotten to except the eternal Word too, if there had been such a divine principle in himself, equal to the Father and distinct from him; for it is a known rule, that an exception from a general assertion confirms it, as to other instances not excepted.

Will they say, that by the Father is meant all three persons here, viz. Father, Son, and Holy Ghost? What, can the Father as opposed to the Son, be put for the Father and the Son? What woful work will this make with Scripture, to suppose that what are opposed to each other do include each other, under the very characters by which they are opposed? As well may they say, that in the baptismal form, by the Father is meant, Father, Son, and Spirit, though he be distinguished from the other two. And I should despair of ever understanding the Scriptures above all books that ever were written, at this rate of interpretation. No doubt, therefore, but the Father, as opposed to the Son, excludes all that is the Son; and then there could be no Son of God that knew of that day which only the Father knew of, and consequently no Son that is God equal to the Father.

3. Moreover, that interpretation must needs be unjust, which, if admitted, will make all, even the most plain speech, uncertain, and utterly insignificant; as this interpretation of Christ's words would do. For as I ask the patrons of this opinion, in what words Jesus Christ could in brief have denied himself to be God most high, if he had a mind to do it, more plain and full than these, in which he says, he knew not all things as the Father did, nor could do all things? So I would fain have them shew me, what words of that nature he could have used, which the same way of interpretation, as they here use, will not evade and make insignificant? For had he said, or sworn in plain words thus, viz. "I tell you I am not the supreme God, and none but my Father has that glory"; they would upon the same reason still have said, this was to be understood of him as man only. So that no words professing himself not to be God, could be a proof of it, if this way of interpretation be allowed. I may therefore safely say thus much, that the blessed Jesus has declared himself not to be the supreme God, or equal to the Father, as plainly as words could speak, or in brief express; and that this declaration made by him already, is not to be evaded any other way, than what will make it impossible his mind should be understood by any words he could have designedly used in the matter. Let any one try if this do not hold true ; and sure it must be an absurd way of interpretation, which leaves a man no opportunity or power of speaking his meaning plainly, so as to be understood.

4. Again, this way of interpretation, which the advocates of the opinion I oppose are so much necessitated to for upholding their cause, does plainly overthrow it again, and may be turned against themselves ; for if it be just and true to deny of Christ absolutely what belongs to him in one nature, because there is another nature in which it belongs not to him ; then, since to be the chief God belongs to him, according to our adversaries, only in one nature, and not in respect of the other, or human nature, it follows that it may as justly be said Jesus Christ is not God, nor to be worshipped or trusted as such ; nay, that he was not before the Virgin Mary, according to them, and the like ; and this without adding any limitation or restriction, any more than our Lord does in the place mentioned.

What would they say to one who should speak or preach so, “ That Jesus is not God, that he cannot do all things, nor is equal to the Father ? ” Would they not conclude he was a denier of the deity of Christ, else he would never speak so unguardedly ? Upon the same account, when Jesus Christ himself says, that he cannot of himself do all things, nor know all things, and makes no reserves in his words, we may conclude he also denies his being supreme God; else, if it be a just way of speaking in him, it cannot be unjust in us to imitate him, by denying him indefinitely to be, what he in any one nature is not, that is, that he is not God, without adding more.

Nay, after this way of speaking, which they attribute to Christ, a man may be taught to say his creed backward, and yet make a true profession of his faith, by denying of Jesus Christ in absolute expressions, whatever may be denied of one of his natures. Thus since the Apostles' Creed takes notice of nothing to be believed concerning Christ, but what belongs to his manhood, (which is strange, if there were any articles relating to his supreme deity, which must be most important,) one may venture to deny them all, with this secret unexpressed reserve, viz. meaning it of the divine nature, (to which they belong not.) So that one may say, I believe that Jesus Christ was not conceived of the Holy Ghost, or born of the virgin Mary; I believe that he never was crucified under Pontius Pilate, nor was dead or buried; that he never rose nor ascended, nor will return visibly again; for his divine nature, which it is pretended he had, was not capable of these things. And since they say, the personality is divine, here seems more warrant to be bolder in denying indefinitely of the person what belongs not to the divine nature, whose the personality is, than in so denying of the person what only belongs not to the human nature ; as this interpretation makes Christ to do.

5. Finally, it weighs something with me, in opposition to this way of interpretation, that the Evangelists never take any occasion, when they had so many, to subjoin any caution against taking Christ's words in their obvious sense, when he says, "he did not know the hour," and the like. If, as we said, our Lord had no mind to reveal his divinity, though I see not still why he should deny it thus, yet sure his Apostles, who wrote so many years after, whom it concerned to reveal all important truths most clearly, would not fail to have set the reader right, by removing such obvious objections as these are against the supreme deity of Christ ; and saying, he spake this only in respect of his manhood, that he knew not all things, &c. John ii. 21 ; xi. 13. But here is not one caution given, as often we find there was about less matters. No doubt it was because they would have the thing understood as it fairly lies, not thinking of any such secret reserve in Christ, of a divine nature in his person, to be tacitly excepted, when he had denied such perfections of his person indefinitely.

Thus it remains good, that Jesus Christ disclaims infinite perfections to belong to him as to the Father ; and therefore that he is not the same infinite God with him, if we can believe his own words. But before I conclude this argument, I shall endeavour to answer what our opposers offer on the contrary side. They say there is abundant evidence from other Scriptures, that Jesus Christ has those perfections in him, which I have shewed in the forementioned places he denies of himself. These they lay in balance to the other; and since both sides cannot be proved, it must be examined, which ought to yield. Particularly they say, omniscience is ascribed to Jesus Christ, even such as is peculiar to the supreme God; and since this indeed is that infinite perfection, which they seem to allege the most plausible testimonies for its belonging to him, therefore I choose to single out this in particular. I think I have made good the negative already from his own mouth, that he did not know all things; nor can any thing of equal evidence and force be produced for the affirmative, as will appear upon considerate examination.

CHAPTER III.

SECTION I.

Answer to Objections founded on some indeterminate Expressions in Scripture. 1. Such as speak generally of Christ's knowing all Things. 2. Such as speak of his knowing Men's Thoughts and Hearts in Particular.

THE instances usually alleged to prove the infinite omniscience of Jesus Christ, are either, 1. Such as speak of his knowing all things in general; or, 2. Of his knowing men's thoughts and hearts in particular. To both which I reply.

First, it is objected, that the disciples ascribe to him the knowledge of all things, as John xvi. 30; xxi. 17. "Thou knowest all things." I answer, that as those expressions are words of admiration from the disciples not yet inspired; so they are intended only to express a very great and comprehensive knowledge, far from infinite divine omniscience; as appears,

1. By Christ's own words; he knew not what the Father knew, viz. the particular time of the day of judgment.

2. In that it was common to ascribe all knowledge to men of extraordinary wisdom, especially when any intended to commend them highly, and were affected with wonder; for admiration and praise naturally incline to run out into hyperboles. Thus the woman of Tekoah, under a surprising wonder at David's sagacity, cries out, "My Lord knows all things on earth, and is as wise as an angel." 2 Sam. xiv. 20. And the Apostle, in commendation of some Christians says "They know all things." 1 John ii. 20. 27. And yet it is plain such encomiums must have their limitations. And indeed the Jews seem to have thought their prophets knew in a manner all things; thus, when a woman of ill fame anointed our Lord's head, the Pharisee says of him, "If this man were a prophet, he would know what manner of woman this is." Luke vii. 39. And when the woman of Samaria found that he told her of all her secret acts, that ever she did, she concludes thus, "Sir, I perceive thou art a prophet." John iv. 19. It is no wonder then if the disciples speak thus of him, "Thou knowest all things," without esteeming him more than the greatest of prophets.

3. It is evident they never intended more, by attributing all knowledge to him, from their own words in one of the texts mentioned, John xvi. 30, where the disciples tell us, how much they inferred from his great knowledge, (which they describe and extol, by saying, Thou knowest all things,) not that he was God, but one sent of God, "By this we believe that thou camest forth from God;" not that thou thyself art that God. So that, by these large expressions, they only intend to attribute to him what a created being is, by divine assistance, capable of; and therefore it is violence to their words, to infer from them, that Jesus Christ is God, when themselves infer no such thing, who best knew their own meaning.

And yet if it were granted that our Lord Jesus knows all things, that is, which actually are; yet if he knows not all futurities too, which himself denies, he comes short of infinite omniscience. For ought I know, a finite being may have a knowledge commensurate to this poor earth, which is but a dust of the balance; and yet not know all God's secret purposes, or the seasons, which the Father keeps in his own hand, Acts i. 7.

Secondly, It is objected, that the knowledge of the heart is ascribed to Christ, John ii. 25. Mat. ix. 9, but especially Rev. ii. 23. And this they say is what belongs to God only, as Solomon judges, 1 Kings viii. 39, and God claims it as his eminent glory, Jer. xvii. 10, and yet Jesus Christ says, "I am he who searches the heart;" therefore, say they, surely he must be that God, who only knows the hearts of all the children of men. I take this to be the strongest instance, that can be produced from the sacred text, for proving any infinite divine perfections to belong to the Lord Jesus Christ, and it shall be seriously considered.

In answer hereto, I shall shew two things. 1. In what sense the searching and knowing the heart is made peculiar to God, and incommunicable to others, by those texts. 2. That notwithstanding it be peculiar to him in some sense; yet these acts may, in another sense, be justly attributed to another, and performed by him who is not the most High God.

1. As to the former, though Solomon says, "Thou, Lord, only knowest the hearts of all men;" yet, what if I say, it is no wonder that Solomon should not know of any other to whom that excellency was communicated, since this mystery of the unsearchable riches and fulness of Christ, and of God's being manifest in his flesh, and his high exaltation of him, was hidden in the ages past, and only manifested in the times of the Gospel? For it is in these latter times that our Lord Jesus has obtained his great authority and dignity, for which he has received answerable abilities. Yet, I add, such expressions in Scripture, appropriating some perfections to God, do only import that God has no equal herein, or that there is an eminent sense only in which such perfections are peculiar to God, and incommunicable to all others; though still in a lower sense something of them may be communicated by him to others.

And this shall be seen to be no forced supposition, but according to the current strain of plain Scripture, in a multitude of instances. Thus it is said, that "God only is wise," Rom. xvi. 27. 1 Tim. i. 17. So Ch. vi. 16. "God only has immortality." So "thou only art holy," Rev. xv. 4. And yet there are wise and holy men, and immortal holy angels and spirits. But the meaning of those appropriate expressions is, that the blessed God is wise, and holy, and immortal, in a more excellent way, and higher sense than all others, and in which sense others cannot be so. So when it is said, God only knows the hearts of men, it must be interpreted the same way, viz. That there is none can know the heart as God does, so universally, so immediately and independently; and yet it is no contradiction to say, that he enables another to do it in great measure under him. And as he would argue but very weakly, who should go about to prove an angel to be God, from this, that he is called holy and wise, which are said to belong to God only; even so in the same manner must they argue, who would prove Jesus Christ to be the supreme God from his knowing men's hearts, because it is said to belong to God only; except they can shew that Jesus Christ knows in the same excellent independent manner and degree as his father, and that he is no more beholden to him for ability and assistance, than he is to his son Jesus Christ. So I might argue from Isa. xlvi. 9, that God only knows futurities, and yet how often have the prophets foretold them from him?

And it is not hard to suppose, that as holiness and wisdom, so to know the thoughts and hearts of men, hath been communicated to Prophets and Apostles. Was there not something of this, if not in the Prophet Elisha's telling the secret counsels of the Syrian king, 2 Kings vi. 12, yet at least in the spirit of discerning mentioned 1 Cor. xii. 10, and in the case of Ananias and Sapphira? Acts v. I grant this was by divine assistance of the Spirit of God, and by Revelation. Neither is our Lord Jesus Christ ashamed to own, that his knowledge is sometimes owing to "revelation from God his Father," Rev. i. 1. If any should ask, how Jesus Christ comes to know all that he reveals in those seven Epistles to the seven Churches, the very first words of that book of the revelations may be an answer; "It was the Revelation which God gave to Jesus Christ," &c. No wonder, then, that he says, he knows their works, their hearts, and their approaching judgments and trials, when his own vast abilities are assisted by God's revelation.

But it will be said, that his searching the heart imports it to be his own act. Answer. So it may very well be; for whatever a man knows, he knows it by his own act. And why may not the mind search, and yet be under the light of revelation, and the influence of superior assistance? But yet after all, these words of searching the heart are only an expression, that denotes the accuracy of his knowledge, not the manner of attaining to it; for, taken properly, as applied to God, it is dishonourable to say, he is put to make a search, since all things are naked and open to his view. And if they must be taken strictly and properly, as applied to Christ, then they belong not to him in the same sense, as they do to God, and so can be no argument of his being that God. Which leads me to shew,

2. That there is no absurdity in attributing this knowledge of the heart to Jesus Christ, though he be not the most high God. That he knows things with some limitation as to the degree, and in dependence on his Father as to the manner, appears by what has been said already. And, therefore, the knowledge of the heart attributed to him, must be such as is consistent with his subordination to the Father's greater knowledge.

It is pleaded, that it is not possible for a finite being to have such universal knowledge of the hearts and ways of men, as is ascribed to Jesus Christ, and which, as head and ruler of the church and world, he ought to have, and therefore he is infinite God.

Answer. I am pretty sure it can never be demonstrated, that it exceeds a finite capacity to know the concerns of all on this earth, when the enlarged understanding is assisted in the highest manner by divine influence and revelation. The reason is, because the object is finite ; and I challenge any man to shew me, how it can be impossible for a finite capacity to comprehend a finite object, as this world is, and would be, though it were ten thousand times greater than it is? I am satisfied this can never be demonstrated to imply any contradiction in it ; and that all such imaginations concerning it proceed chiefly from too high a conceit of man, and too low apprehension of the infinite God ; as if the distance between these two were so small, that there could not be one made of a capacity so much above men, as to be commensurate to them all, but presently he must be the most high God ; as though that supreme Being could not produce one, who should be a thousand times beyond all this earth and its inhabitants, and yet be infinitely below himself. Methinks, if the sun was but an intelligent creature, and could diffuse his intellectual influences as he does his natural, could but see and understand with his beams and secret influences, it is easy to imagine what a penetrating and comprehensive knowledge he might have ; but we may entertain much greater thoughts of the Sun of Righteousness, Jesus Christ.

And I conceive a strong argument to prove Jesus Christ, as man, capable of such deep and extensive knowledge, may be drawn from the offices of dignity and power conferred on him by God. For God has "given to him to be head over all things." Eph. i. 22. "He has given or committed to him all judgment ;" and that as the "Son of man." Joh. v. 22. 27. In short, his kingly office, by which he rules over all the world, and takes special care of all his members, as it necessarily supposes his knowledge of the whole estate of his church, and every member of it, as far as is necessary for the discharge of that trust ; so I think it undeniably proves this large knowledge to be exercised by him as man, however he gains it.

For since this office and power is given, it cannot terminate in the divine nature ; for who can give to God any dignity or power, who has all originally in his own being ? It must then be given to the man, or human nature only. And if the man Christ Jesus sustains this office, and be invested with this kingly power, even with all power in heaven and earth ; then as man we cannot deny him to be suitably qualified for it with all requisite abilities, lest we reproach God, as calling one to an employment, who is not fitted for it, or himself in assuming a trust, which he is not able to discharge. Besides, unless his human nature can execute this power, it cannot be said to be given to it ; for a power, which cannot be exerted, or is impossible to be executed, is not given nor received, any more than a commission, or grant to a stock or a tree, to bear rule, not over the other trees, as in Jotham's apologue, but over a nation, or to command an army. It is no gift at all, if this were the case, that the man Christ Jesus be utterly incapable of the office and government lodged in him.

If it be said, that though the office and delegated authority be committed to the human, yet it is only executed by the divine nature in Christ ; I answer, it is most unreasonable to suppose this trust committed to the man Christ, who must at last deliver it up ; and yet the management of it belongs only to another being. How can he be commended for being "faithful over the house of God, to him who appointed or constituted him," when it is not expected he should execute his office ? I grant, indeed, that his kingly office is executed by the assistance of God, as he exerts his divine power and wisdom through the human nature of Christ, and communicates of them in all fulness to him, in whom it dwells ; but to say, that the man Christ does not exercise his kingly universal power, but that his divine nature, (supposing it,) does solely and immediately execute the office given to him as man or mediator, (for to God can nothing be given,) is, in my mind, a most gross absurdity ; for it is to say, that God officiates for man, in execution of a de- legated or subordinate authority ; or that he acts under the authority, and in the name of a creature, which is not meet to be said of the supreme God. It remains, therefore, that as Christ's universal kingdom and headship is by gift from God, of which only the man Christ is the receiver, committed as a trust to him, so he certainly wants no ability to execute the trust in the nature entrusted with it ; I say, no ability, whether of power or knowledge, sufficient to render him a careful, vigorous, and every way most effectual head of his body, and ruler of the world ; and to deny this, is to rob him of his greatest glory.

Besides, what benefit or gift is it to the man Christ, that the divine nature should execute a power which it always had, and could exercise without any gift to him ? What reward, or what addition was this to him ?

Another argument may be drawn from that comfortable ground of confidence in a Christian's address to God, which the Scripture lays down, viz. the sympathising compassion of our Lord Jesus Christ towards his distressed servants, arising from his own sufferings when on earth, " Seeing we have not an high priest, who cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted as we are ; let us therefore come boldly to the throne of grace." Heb. iv. 15, 16. Christ's having been tried with sufferings makes him a more compassionate earnest advocate for us ; and this is our comfort.

Now it is certain, this compassion arising from his own experience of trouble, can belong to none but his human nature ; the divine nature is compassionate, not for this reason, because it was tempted or grieved with misery. No, it was only the man Christ suffered, and consequently feels a sympathy from hence with his distressed servants. And it is most certain, that if he sympathises with them in their troubles, he must then know them in that nature which only has a fellow feeling of them ; for none can sympathise with the miseries of others, which he knows not of. So that they, who deny Christ's human nature to be capable of the knowledge of all our miseries, do, in effect, deny him to be such a compassionate advocate as the Scripture represents him, and rob us of this strong ground of consolation and hope in our approaches to God, which the Apostle would have us to build on.

And this doctrine has been so far from appearing either impossible or absurd to the reason of mankind, that I might produce the consent of a very great number of learned men, even among them who oppose my other opinions. The Lutherans allow the man Christ a sort of universal knowledge, as well as universal presence, which they plead for. The schoolmen, both Thomists and Scotists, allow him universal knowledge, though they differ in their way of explaining it.

And there was a time in the sixth century, when in the christian church some were branded with Heresy, under the name of Agnoetæ, who held Christ was ignorant of anything, which I conceive must have been in relation to his human nature; for those persons owned him to have a divine nature, and it is hard to imagine they could attribute ignorance to that. But waving that matter, which is disputed, it is enough for my purpose to prove what sense the christian church then had of Christ's extensive knowledge, as man; that they who wrote against those heretics do expressly deny any ignorance in Christ as man. For this we may produce two famous patriarchs of the christian church at that time, Eulogius of Alexandria, and Gregory of Rome; those heretics produced for their opinion Christ's words, that he knew not the time of the last judgment, as an instance of his ignorance. To this the former person says, that he was not ignorant of it, not as man, and much less as God. The latter says, In natura quidem humanitatis novisse, sed non ex natura humanitatis. He knew it with the human nature, but that knowledge did not rise from the humanity; which is what I maintain as to the knowledge I attribute to him, but not extending it so far as to all futurities, which they did.

And I find not a few of the modern reformed divines, who, when out of this dispute, speak agreeable to this, and are far from thinking it idolatry to ascribe as much knowledge as I have done, to the man Christ. Thus the reverend Mr Baxter, in his notes on Eph. iv. 16, plainly intimates, that he conceives an angel might be made capable of ruling the universal church on earth by legislation, judgment, and execution; for having said this task was impossible to any power but divine, he corrects himself, by adding, or angelical at least; and sure the man Christ's ability is far superior to angels; besides that he has them ministering to him, and giving him notice of matters if there be any occasion; for he has seven principal spirits, who are the "eyes of the Lamb sent forth through all the earth," as the same author interprets, Rev. v. 6.

So the author of the little book, called, The Future State, the same who wrote the Good Samaritan, a worthy Divine of the church of England, says many things very rational concerning the large extent of Christ's human knowledge; that probably, "he can as easily inspect the whole globe of this earth, and the heavens that compass it, as we can view a globe of an inch diameter!" p. 46, 47. "That he intercedes as man; and can he intercede in a case which he knows not?" So again, p. 150. The like says Limborch in his Theol. Christ. lib. 5. c. 18.

Let me add only the testimony of Dr Thomas Goodwin, who was never I suppose censured for an Idolater among Dissenters; and yet it is scarce possible that I should attribute greater knowledge to the man Jesus Christ than he. See his "Select Cases," Part III, where he says, the "human understanding of Christ takes in all occurrences which concern his church. And that as he said, All power in heaven and earth is given me of my Father; so might he say, all knowledge in heaven and earth is given me, that his beams pierce into every corner, that he knows the sore of every heart. And concludes with these remarkable words, "that as a looking glass wrought in the form of a globe, represents the images of all that is in the room, so the enlarged human understanding of Christ takes in all things in heaven and earth at once." It seems these men did not take it to be the peculiar perfection of the divine nature to know the hearts, so as that no creature could partake of it by divine assistance and revelation.

Indeed, as to the manner of knowing the heart, we cannot tell how the inhabitants of the other world have access to our minds, or to each other's; but without doubt, Jesus Christ, whose eyes are as a flame of fire, has more proper abilities for penetration, as well as more revelation from God, and more capacity for receiving and treasuring it up, than all others. In short, it is evident, Christ as man is the great administrator of God's providential kingdom; as man he must judge the whole world, which implies vast and universal knowledge. John v. 27. Acts xvii. 31. Who then dares say, that the man Christ Jesus has not a knowledge as large as this narrow earth, or "as the sand by the sea shore," without any hyperbole? I think it is beyond all reasonable doubt; and as this doctrine has appeared rational enough, and escaped all censure, as far as I know, when delivered by others than the Unitarians; so I hope it must not be counted heretical in them, for which others never forfeited the glorious title of Orthodox.

Thus it appears, that all which is said of Christ's extensive knowledge in Scripture, is far from proving him to be the supreme infinite God; it may be accounted for otherwise very fairly; and the like may be also said with respect to other (which some call) divine perfections attributed to him, that they are no more truly infinite, as attributed to him, than this of knowledge, but that there are plain evidences of their being attributed to him in a limited and inferior sense, in comparison of what they are, in the most glorious God over all Gods; and therefore men had need produce other sort of arguments for the supreme deity of Christ, than from these topics.

SECTION II.

Answer to the Arguments drawn from the Worship due to our Lord Jesus, shewing ultimate Supreme Worship of Him to be inconsistent with the Gospel Doctrine of his Mediation.

Nor do I doubt but I could maintain my cause with equal advantage, upon the head of divine worship, which is another topic, whence my opposers would infer the deity of the Lord Jesus Christ. It were easy to shew, there is no instance of supreme divine worship given ultimately to him in Scripture, but on the contrary, that all the honour it assigns to him is such as speaks him to be inferior to the Father, and dependent on him ; since it is wholly grounded upon what God his father has graciously bestowed on him. Thus he requires baptism, if that be an act of immediate proper worship, in his name, because all power in heaven and earth was given to him. Thus we must honour the Son as (truly, not as greatly as) we honour the Father ; because the " Father hath committed, or given, all judgment to him." John v. 22, 23. Thus at " the name of Jesus must every knee bow, and every tongue confess him to be Lord ;" Phil. ii. 10, 11, because as a reward of his obedience, the Father " hath given him a name above every name ;" and it is added, that all this homage is ultimately to the " glory of the Father." Worship, which is thus grounded upon derived and borrowed excellency, is not supremely divine, and cannot be offered to the infinite, selforiginate, independent Deity, without a great affront, because it is not the most excellent. Mal. i. 14. To praise an independent God for honour and power granted to him by another, supposes a falsehood, and mingles reproaches with praise.

So that however there may be the same common external acts or words, such as bowing the knee, and saying glory and praise, used to God and the Mediator ; as also in some instances, they are given in common to ordinary men ; yet the mind of a rational worshipper will make a distinction in his inward intention, as no doubt but those devout Jews did, who in the same act "bowed their heads, and worshipped both God and the King." 1 Chron. xxix. 20. But I shall not pursue this any farther at present.

Moreover, I judge, that to assert Jesus Christ to be the supreme God subverts the Gospel doctrine of his mediation; for if I must have one, who is supreme God and man, for my mediator with God, then, when I address to Jesus Christ as the supreme God, where is the God-man that must be my mediator with him? To say he mediates with himself, is the same as to say, that I must go to him without a mediator; and turns the whole business of mediation into a metaphor, contrary to the common sense of things, as well as against the Scripture. And I would gladly know what is the notion of going to God without a mediator, if this be all, that he mediates with himself? Who ever doubted the exercise of his own wisdom or mercy, that these do in a sort plead in him? But sure the Scriptures speak of a mediator without him, when they set forth Jesus Christ as such; and who is this mediator, when we go to Jesus Christ as the ultimate object? If it be said his human nature only acts in this mediation, though as united to the divine; I answer, that as this is still to make Christ mediator with himself, so the human nature is not God-man; and if the man, or human nature alone be capable of doing the part of a mediator, then it is not necessary that Jesus Christ should be more than a man inhabited by, and related to God, in order to that office. Nor may it be said, that the union to the divine nature gives an infinite efficacy to those acts, of which the human only is the principal; for unless by that union, the human nature was turned into an infinite or divine nature, its acts can no more be reckoned properly and intrinsically infinite in this case, than his body or human understanding are infinite, because so united to an infinite nature.

But what fully demonstrates, that the human nature of Christ can never be an effectual mediator, according to them, no, not though it were personally united to the divine, is this, viz. That they deny this human nature so united, to have the knowledge of the secret mental prayers, the inward desires and distresses of all Christians, or to know any one's heart. And how then can he be a compassionate intercessor in cases that he knows nothing of? Or how can he have a fellow feeling of their sufferings, which he knows not that they feel at all? What comfort is there in this account of Christ's mediation? The divine nature is precluded from it, because they direct us to seek to that as the ultimate object through a mediator; and the human nature, they say, may know nothing of our case, nor knows our hearts, whether we worship sincerely, or repent sincerely, or hypocritically only; and so knows not how to represent or recommend us to God. What a case now do these men bring us into?

There is no mediator left to interpose with the supreme God ; so that we must deal with him immediately and alone, which they will own is far from the Gospel doctrine or method. Thus is the Lord Jesus turned out of his office, on a pretence of giving him a higher honour. So that upon the whole, as far as I see, we had even as good be content with the Apostle's fair and plain account of this matter ; if its being so very intelligible may not be an unpardonable objection against it, viz. That "there is but one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." 1 Tim. ii. 5. Never let us fear, but St Paul knew how to describe the Mediator, without leaving out the better half of him, or the principal nature. Our Mediator, according to him, was only called a "man ;" who also is by office a God, or ruler over all, made so by him who puts all things under him.

And indeed as there are two principal distinguishing doctrines of Christianity, relating to the unity of the supreme God, and the one Mediator with him ; so the Trinitarians have lost them both among their several parties. For as they are divided into two principal parties, besides several subdivisions, both among Conformists and Dissenters, one part holding three real persons, or infinite Beings, the other but one ; (for they are not yet agreed whether they worship three infinite supreme beings, or but one,) so between them both, these two great doctrines are subverted ; the Realists leave room for a Mediator in the Godhead, but they destroy the unity of God, who is one infinite Being ; on the other hand, they who hold true to the divine unity, or one infinite Being under three modes, or properties, or relations, do, by plain consequence, leave no place for such a Mediator as they require, viz. one who is an infinite God, to be a mediator with the infinite God, when there is no other infinite Being but his own, and he cannot be thought to intercede with himself neither. So that to keep the Gospel faith whole and undefiled, it is necessary that we avoid both these rocks, by believing God and his Christ to be two beings, that so there may be room for one to mediate with the other ; and that these two are not two equal or supreme beings, but one subordinate to the other, that so we may preserve the unity of the supreme God.

Let us then bethink ourselves seriously, not what the church in latter days has thought of Jesus Christ, but what his own Apostles, when inspired, have thought of him. Methinks none was more likely, or ever had a fairer occasion to represent his Lord in the height of his glory, than the Apostle Peter in the day of Pentecost ; that day of triumph, with the newly and visibly inspired Apostles. Hear how magnificently he describes his glorious Lord Jesus before his murderers. “Ye men of Israel hear these words, Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you, by miracles, wonders, and signs, which God did by him in the midst of you." Acts ii. 22. Again, "Let all the House of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ." Acts ii. 36. Now it is observable, the Apostle was aiming at such a description of Jesus Christ, as might strike the hearts of his murderers with the greatest horror of their crime; and therefore could never omit the most emphatical branch of his description, viz. his infinite Deity, if he had really been such.

What a terrifying argument had that been to beget conviction in his persecutors beyond all the rest, to tell them, they had shed the blood of the infinite God himself? It is certainly all flat and low that St Peter says in comparison of this, viz. "That he was a man approved of God." Did he not understand, or would he betray his cause by such an omission? And yet he only represents Christ as a God by inhabitation and exaltation, when he was far from being daunted with any fear to own Christ fully. Nay, if this deity of Christ were a fundamental article of the Christian faith, how comes it to pass, that when poor convinced souls, in anguish for their crimes, seek direction how to be saved from them, the Apostle should not acquaint them with this article, but directs them to believe in this Jesus, such as he had described him? Acts ii. 37. Did he direct wounded souls to an insufficient Saviour, without telling them, he was the infinite God? Yet they are baptised and added to the church, and numbered among such as shall be saved. How can this be, if the supreme Godhead of Christ be a fundamental article of the Christian faith? So Acts x. 38. "God was with him." This was all.

SECTION III.

The Writers against the Unitarians unsay their own Arguments against the Papists.

To conclude, God and Christ, (or one anointed,) are two disparates, or different things, as much as Christ's body and bread are, and therefore cannot be predicated one of the other, in a proper sense, or without a figure, as all our writers against the Romish transubstantiation argue; and it is of equal force in the present case. To be anointed, imports to be raised by authority and honour conferred; it is in effect to say, the person is a creature, or inferior being; and therefore to say, that properly Christ is most high God, is to say, the inferior is supreme, and the man is God; which cannot be, otherwise than by a figure, as the bread is Christ's body, viz. by relation, &c. And truly if the business can be salved here, by making a personal union between God and Christ, I see not why the Papists may not set up such another union between Christ's body and the bread in the eucharist, and then they may stoutly defend that it is the body of Christ properly. But, indeed, nothing is more obvious than the unsteadiness of many Protestant writers, when they write against the Papists and the Unitarians. How do they go backwards and forwards? And when they have triumphantly and fully beaten off the vain assaults and objections of the Papists, they take up their baffled arguments, and urge them the same way, as others did against them, against the Unitarians; and what they have maintained against the former, as good argument, notwithstanding Romish evasions, these arguments they oppose, when the Unitarians turn them against themselves, in the point of the Trinity; and they betake themselves to like shifts and evasions.

Thus let the Papists object to them the novelty of the Protestant religion, and ask them where was their religion and church before Luther? They think it a weak-cavil, and can tell them their religion was in the Bible, and their church among the primitive christians, however it lay hid in the time of common apostacy; and yet to the Unitarians they can make the same objection. Where has any christian church, for so many ages, held that Christ was not God? Against the Papist they will prove, that the Fathers did not hold the elements to be Christ's real body and blood, because they oft call them the images thereof; but let the Unitarians argue that Christ is not the supreme God, because the Scripture styles him the image of God, and therefore not the God whose image only he is; then the thing itself and its image must be the same thing.* Against the Papist they can prove St Peter was inferior to the church, and the rest of the Apostles, (though not singly to each,) because he was sent up and down by them. This Baronius takes hold of, and tells them, by the same reason they must grant the Arians' argument to be good, viz. that the Father is greater than the Son, because the Son is sent by him. But let an Unitarian argue thus, and then, though the Father sends, and the Son be sent by him, yet they shall both be equal, and this shall make no difference.

Against the Papists they will boast, that they do not hoodwink the people in ignorance ; but bid them inquire and examine, and the more the better, while it is ground of suspicion, that the Papists cheat men, by their keeping them from the light ; but now having to do with the Unitarians, they tack about, and bid beware of reading and disputing ; they are for an implicit faith, without examining into deep mysteries ; they bid us believe, not pry into them ; though we only desire to examine whether the Scriptures do reveal any such mysteries at all ; the rest we will believe, if we could see that, and desire no other liberty in interpreting Scripture, than they take so justly in interpreting Christ's words, " This is my body." Upon Protestant principles the Unitarians think they can stand their ground, and defend themselves in these matters, as easily as the Protestant can against the Papists.

As to primitive antiquity, so many inquirers, both among the Romish and Reformed writers, have given their impartial testimony, that it runs for Arius's doctrine; and have made such poor apologies for those Fathers, as though they knew not, or were not careful of their fundamental articles of faith, till they came to be banded about in general Councils, that I think it not needful to say more here. Only one thing I would suggest; that allowing the primitive writers to speak in different places with great, at least seeming discord, which any ingenuous man must grant, sometimes plainly declaring Jesus Christ inferior to, and the servant of the Father, before his incarnation; at other times giving him high titles, as of one equal with God; yet it is far more reasonable to suppose the higher expressions should be expounded according to the other, than the contrary; because in discoursing of, and pleading for a beloved admired object, as the Lord Jesus deserves to be, it is very easy and natural to run out into strains of eloquence, and lofty flights of praise, which must be interpreted not with strict rigour, but with great abatements, as is to be observed in some of their high encomiums on the venerable mystery of the eucharist, as though with the Papists they took the elements for Christ's real Body, which yet they evidently did deny. But on the contrary, no men are wont ever to speak diminutively on such occasions; they could not have a thought to lessen their master's glory; and therefore if they ever represent him as not the supreme God, nor equal to him, we have all reason to think, they then spake the words of truth and soberness, and what the exact matter required.

For my own part, as I write this under the serious impressions of those great relations in which the blessed Jesus stands to me, whom I credit as my great teacher; whom I desire to admire and love as my gracious endeared benefactor, beyond father and mother, or friends; whom I reverence as my Lord and ruler, and solemnly expect as my final glorious judge, who is to come in his own, and in his Father's glory; and in the mean time deal with God through him, as my only Mediator and Intercessor; so I earnestly profess, that it is not without grievous and bitter resentments, that I should be employed in writing things, which by so many well meaning Christians will be misinterpreted, to be derogatory to the honour of this great Redeemer. But I know he loves nothing but truth in his cause, and will never be offended, I hope, with any who stand by his own words, viz. "The Father is greater than I." John xiv. 28. I think it a dangerous thing to say, God is not greater than he, or is not the head of Christ; for, "whom will ye equal to me, saith the Holy One?" Isa. xl. 25. I am persuaded it is truth I plead for, and that supports me.

SECTION IV.

The Conclusion, exhorting Christians to Moderation and Temper in their Management of this Controversy.

However, I wish they who are adversaries to my persuasion, would learn at least the modesty of one of the earliest writers for Christianity since the Apostles, that we have, I mean Justin Martyr, disputing with a Jew, and pleading for the honour of Jesus Christ, whom he calls "God by the will of the Father," and one who "ministered to his will," before his incarnation. This person attempts to shew, that Jesus Christ did preexist of old, as a God, (in his sense,) and was born afterwards of a virgin; but because, as he says, there were some who confessed him to be Christ, and yet denied those points of his preexistence and his miraculous birth of a virgin, that Father calmly says to his adversary, "If I shall not demonstrate these things, that he did preexist, and was born of a virgin; yet still the cause is not lost, as to his being the Christ of God; if I do not prove that he did preexist, &c. it is just to say that I am mistaken in this thing only, and not to deny that he is the Christ; for whosoever he be, that is every way demonstrated, that he is the Christ." And as for those Christians, who denied the above said things, and held him to be only a man, born in the ordinary way, he only says of them, to whom I accord not.

He does not damn them, who differed from him, nor will say the Christian religion is subverted, and Christ but an impostor, and a broken reed to trust on, if he be not the very supreme God, (the ranting dialect of some in our age ;) no, but still he was sure he is the true Christ, whatever else he might be mistaken in. It is desperate wickedness in men to hazard the reputation of the truth and holiness of the blessed Jesus upon a difficult and disputable opinion ; to dare to say, that if they are mistaken in their opinion, which I verily believe they are, then Jesus Christ is a liar and a deceiver, a mock Saviour, and the like. What is this but to expose him to the scorn of infidels ?

So that I see with sorrow, that to this very day, even among professed Christians themselves, Christ crucified is to some a stumblingblock, and to others foolishness. If he be not as good and great as the God who appointed him for a Saviour, though he be allowed to be a man approved of God, by signs and mighty wonders, which God did by him, and by whom God made the worlds, as the instrument ; though he be granted to be one in whom dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead, so as it never dwelt before in prophets or any other ; though he be one with the Father, by unity of consent and will, as Calvin interprets John x. 30, one in testimony with the Father and Spirit, as Beza and many others understand that in 1 John v. 7 ; though he be the most lively visible image of God that the world ever saw, so that he who sees him does, in great measure, see the Father, as in a bright mir-

your John xiv. 10 ; though he be owned and served, as one far above angels and archangels, and over all powers in heaven and earth, a God or Ruler, the great administrator of God's kingdom, both on earth and in the invisible hades, as having the keys, or ministerial power of death and hell, Rev. i. 18 ; yet, after all this, if he be not the very supreme God himself ; nay, to complete the absurdity, if he be not the very same God, whose Son and Image he is, he shall be no mediator for them. They do, ex hypothesi, or on this supposition, openly disown him for their Saviour and Confidence ; they are ashamed to trust in him, and seem rather to deride and reproach him, as insufficient and contemptible, than to believe on him.* These things are to me a very grievous offence, who think it a great pity that so excellent a constitution as the Gospel is, so amiable to contemplate, so proper to entertain our thankful admiration for the grace and wisdom it contains, should either be lost in the clouds of an affected obscurity, or exposed to the derision of ungodly scoffers.

It is yet a farther grief to think, what a fatal stop is hereby put to the progress of the Gospel ; whose rejection by Jews, Mahometans and Pagans, is undeniably occasioned by the common doctrine of the incarnation of God. One may read in Le Compte's history of China, how the heathens derided the christians' doctrine of a mortal God ; and upon that account esteemed christianity as fabulous as their own religion. And Doctor Casaubon, in his book of Credulity and Incredulity, says, he could prove by many instances out of history, that this “doctrine has kept more people from embracing the christian faith, than any other thing he knew of.” Now though I grant, that if it be the certain truth of God, this must be no argument against receiving it; yet surely it should make men very cautious and impartial in their inquiry about it, lest they bring on themselves the woe denounced against them by whom offences, that is, stumbling blocks in the way of the Gospel, do come.

In the mean time, in the midst of these troubles, it is a great and sweet refreshment to wait and hope for a remove to the mount Moriah, the land of vision above, where all these shades of melancholy night shall vanish away, and an eternal day of clear light and peace shall shine on them, “who love our Lord Jesus in sincerity;” in whose glorious dignity I rejoice; nay, I desire to boast and glory in this exalted, enthroned Redeemer; for “worthy is the Lamb to receive glory,” and honour, and blessing, and power. Amen. So be it! Now to him who loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests to God, even the Father, to him be glory and dominion forever. “But this I confess unto thee, that after the way, which they call Heresy, so worship I the God of my Fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and the prophets.” Acts xxiv. 14.

DANGER OF RASHNESS

FROM THE APPENDIX TO EMLYN'S NARRATIVE.

THE plain truth is, if Christians would believe with a holy religious faith, and be content with a religious, rather than a philosophical creed, Christianity would better be preserved; for what is it but a scholastic philosophical faith, that runs upon metaphysical notions of essence, and persons, and emanations, and constitutibility, and the methods of divine decrees, and God's physical operation and concurrence? The holy Christian faith regards God in a religious sense, not so much in his infinity, immensity, spirituality, and other natural and absolute excellencies, as in his relative excellencies and moral perfections, viz. as our maker, our owner, our ruler, disposer, judge, benefactor, and chief good; and it regards Jesus Christ as our sufficient Mediator, by whose intervention we are brought into God's favour, and are taught his will.

And as he is a good believer in God, who reveres his majesty, is moulded into his will, loves and trusts in him, and makes him the centre of his delightful rest, and satisfying joy; so is he a good believer in Jesus Christ, who owns him as his Lord; who receives and obeys his laws, credits his threats and promises, and confides in his mediation and intercession; without subtle philosophising upon his nature and generation, or without forensic political disquisitions, and logical quibbles about justification.

What if all Christians have not the same abstracted speculations of God and Christ, (for all have not the same knowledge,) is it therefore not the same God, and the same Lord? Yes, doubtless; if the Jews believed in Jesus Christ when on earth, though they believed not his miraculous conception, would any say it was not the same Christ that other disciples believed in? Surely it was enough, that Jesus was he, John viii. 24. whatever different notions they had about his origin. And it is the same if an honest Christian believes him sufficient to bring him to salvation, without being able to give a philosophical or critical account how he has this sufficiency; so that here will still be one God, and one Lord, both theirs and ours, by which Christians may unite and agree in the doctrine which is according to godliness. And so Constantine the emperor seems to have meant, when he advised Alexander and Arius not to break communion for such things, comparatively small, since consistent with the principal design of religion, if not too nicely debated and imposed.*

And thus it is in other points relating to Almighty God. The holy Scriptures require no accurate philosophical notions of God's eternity, omnipresence, immensity, &c; they are content to give us only popular easy accounts of these matters, viz. that God was before the earth was formed; and that he fills heaven and earth with his presence, that he sees all things, and can exert his power everywhere; which are far from being accurate notions of eternity and immensity. They trouble not men with the niceties of eternal successions, or an eternal $\tau\acute{o}\ \rho\acute{\upsilon}\nu\nu$ without succession, or with infinite spaces, or of God's being present in part, or in whole, and the like metaphysical difficulties. No, if these things offer themselves to natural light in men of capacity and fine speculation, and they can fancy they have accurate notions about them, it is well and good; let them enjoy their own acquisitions; but this is not owing to Christianity, but philosophy; and so is not incumbent on every good Christian, nor required as matter of a virtuous religious belief; our religion imposes no such difficulties on us of believing with the understanding, what we cannot so much as perceive by it; it only requires us to believe what it reveals to us, that is, to our understanding and apprehension. Let the wise men, let the Scribes, let the disputers of this world, busy and tire themselves as much as they please in such disquisitions; the Christian is happy enough in the easy popular notions of such divine perfections, when so powerfully received, as to form his mind into a holy admiration, reverence, and love of God; and his life to a serious obedient conformity to his will and laws. Let who will damn or reject him for not understanding their long critical philosophical creeds, their modes and subsistencies, or personalities; or for not professing them without understanding; the christian religion threatens him with no harm from God himself.

And men must not think, that like other arbitrary societies, they may appoint what terms of union and communion they please in the churches; and then cry, They who like them not, may go elsewhere; and that their ministers, when they no longer fancy them, shall be cast off at will and humour, for different sentiments about unscriptural words or notions; for a christian church has its terms and laws settled by Christ; it is his church, and the table is the Lord's table, and the ministers are Christ's ministers; and it is the highest usurpation in us to make inclosures, when he has left it open; and to turn out members, or pastors from their office, if they walk and act according to the design of their christian station. And men had need be sure, that the denying their unscriptural tests and shibboleths is such a crime as will justify these proceedings; otherwise, though it may signify little what has been done to me, the unworthiest of many ; yet, in general, he whose name was in the book of life, Phil. iv. 3. has told us, οὐ μικρὰ ἀμαρτία, &c. *It is no small sin, to turn out from their office those, who have unblamably attended their ministry.

I know very well, that men of an uncharitable complexion think they may justify their severity and bitter zeal, from the Apostle's counsel, to reject and avoid heretics ; but they would do well to consider seriously these few things, lest they abuse and pervert this counsel.

1. Whether all such heresies were not attended with immoral doctrines or practices, in a plain and uncontested opposition to the Apostle's doctrine ? And therefore those heresies are "works of the flesh ;" vicious, and immoral, and wilful acts, as drunkenness, adultery, &c. And the heretics were selfcondemned, without the decision of a synod ; accordingly one may see their foul characters, in 2 Pet. ii. and St Jude's Epistle. This made Augustine say, Hæreticus esse nolo ; because he could answer for his will † ; but when serious convictions and real strugglings of conscience force a man to own doctrines, which he takes to be the truths of Christ, against all the interests of the flesh and his worldly comfort, which he had rather lose than offend God ; how is it possible, if this man should be mistaken, that yet he should be such a heretic? *Nunquam errari tutius existimo, quam cum in nimio amore veritatis erratur. It is his great love of truth that makes him err, and such error cannot be dangerous. “And certain it is, that he who after a pious attentive consideration falls into error, is more worthy, if not of praise, yet of pardon, than he that blindly assents to truth itself;” says Bishop RUST.

* Clem. Ep. c. 44.

† See Hales of Eaton in his Tract of Schism ; " Heresy," says he, " is an act of the will, not of reason ; and is indeed a lie, not a mistake."

2. Whether in the ecclesiastical sense of the word Heresy, (as noting a fundamental error about the christian faith,) any, in the truly primitive church, were accounted Heretics, who received the primitive ancient creed, before any council presumed to frame new ones? This was wont to be the sufficient test of christianity and church communion, which I willingly assent to in its plain and fair sense. No subtle intricate interpretations were then obtruded as necessarily to be received; and indeed all sides tell us, when they please, that the fundamentals of christianity are plain and easy to be seen; and make this the great commendation of our religion. But where should they be plain, if not in the Creed? The express words of Bishop Davenant, so venerable and judicious in the sense of all parties, cited by Mr Howe in his Sermon of Union among Protestants, are thus; “He that believes the things contained in the Apostles’ Creed, and endeavours to live a life agreeable to the precepts of Christ, ought not to be expunged from the roll of Christians, nor be driven from communion with the members of any church whatever.”

3. Whether, at least, it be not extremely difficult for any to know, (if bare speculative error must be heresy,) what is heresy, and who are heretics now in these distant distracted ages, when Christians are so perplexed and divided in their interpretations and explications of many articles? In the Apostles' times, it was easy to know certainly who were in the wrong, by their open opposition to them, whom all the churches allowed to be right, and to be the infallible directors of their faith, and who contradicted such errors; but now each party appeals to their writings, and think they embrace their true meaning. But bishops and councils are not Christ and his Apostles. Here let me use the late Dr Sherlock's words against the Papists, for in controversy with them one may hear what they will not tell us in disputing against others. “While nothing,” says he, “was heresy, but the denial of a plain acknowledged article of the christian faith, and there was no dispute, who were heretics, the power of deposing heretics was sacred and venerable, and had its just authority and effects; but since the controversy is what is heresy, and the world is divided about it, (what if he had said so of schism too?) though the power remains, yet the exercise of it becomes contemptible, when a church first coins new articles of faith, and then censures and deposes them for heretics who do not believe them.”* It is not the same thing to reject the sacred text, and to mistake its sense. St Augustine says something to the same purpose; that “it could hardly, if at all, be determined what made one a heretic.”† And surely it can as little be determined now, by a wise man, though fools are hasty. And therefore what he said elsewhere is very rational, and worth considering by those who are fierce and rash in their charge of heresy, Sæviant illi, &c. “Let them be fierce and cruel, who know not how easy it is to err.”

If such things were duly considered by hasty zealots, they would not be so prodigal of their anathemas; but would find the matter of heresy among conscientious Christians so very hard, and the precepts of love, peace, meekness and forbearance towards them who differ, so very easy, and plain to be discerned, that if an ill temper did not bias them more to what is cruel, and unkind, one would think none could be so bad a casuist, as not to determine on the plainest and most pleasant side of the question; and so “let brotherly love still continue.” At least it would make any good natured man speak with Salvian, Errant, sed bono animo errant; apud nos hæretici sunt, apud se

* Sherlock's Vindication of Protestant Principles about Church Government, p. 31.

non sunt, &c. “They do not think themselves heretics, though we do; they err, but it is with an honest mind; and how it will go with them at the great day, none but the Judge himself can tell.”* This is more Christian, and becoming a modest sense of our darkness and difficulties, than to pronounce honest minded men odious to God, and to render them odious to ignorant men, by charging them with, and anathematising them for damnable heresies; and that usually by rote as we have been taught, without knowing what, or how to answer, what they have to say for themselves, and which perhaps we are afraid should be known to others.

BY MRS BARBAULD.

THOUGHTS

PUBLIC WORSHIP.

[THIS essay, as remarkable for the strength and beauty of its composition, as for its elevated and rational tone of piety, was written in reply to Mr Wakefield's treatise, in which this very learned and ingenious author attempted to show from the Scriptures, that there are no good grounds for the present custom of social, or public worship among Christians. He builds his argument on the practice of the Saviour, his precepts, and the example of the Apostles. He quotes many passages to illustrate each of these, and concludes from the whole, that no proofs can be found in the sacred writings of its having been designed by the founder of our religion, that certain days and seasons should be set apart for ceremonial or formal worship in a public manner. He thinks, also, that if such an institution as the sabbath had been intended to be perpetual in the christian church, it would have been enjoined by a direct, positive precept, or at least indicated by some explicit declaration on the part of the Saviour or his Apostles; whereas, nothing is said expressly on the subject, as implying a command, or rule, or recommendation, in any part of the Scriptures. Mr Wakefield considers secret devotion as most conformable to the practice and precepts of Christ, and as most acceptable to God.

“The witness of our prayers,” says he, “according to the command of our great Instructor, is not to be the congregation of Christians, but the invisible Father of mankind. The theatre of our devotions must not be the Chapel, the Church, or the Cathedral, tumultuous with the busy hum of men, but the secrecy and silence of the closet. It is not, Jesus tells us, the duty of an humble Christian, by ringing his bell or blowing his horn, to invite multitudes of spectators to stimulate the fervour and to testify the patience of his devotions. He is not expected to show his homage to the Ruler of the universe, as we pay our respects to earthly potentates, in crowds, and pomp, and tumult; we must shut the door even of our closet, that no eye, so much as of our own household, may obtrude upon the tranquillity of our meditations, and no vanity be gratified by the curious observance of an admiring brother. Our concern is with God only. Let his inspection be our applause; and our recompense, his approbation. The features of resignation, unseen by man, will be faithfully marked by his eye; the secret whisper, the retired sigh, unheard in the congregation, will vibrate on his ear, and be registered in the volume of his remembrance, to testify in our favour before men and angels, when the formalities and fopperies of ceremonial worship are swept into oblivion.”

Mr Wakefield's only argument against the use of public worship, which has much weight, is that drawn from the fact of the sabbath not being a positive institution under the christian scheme. But even taking this for granted, it does not follow, that the observance of a stated day of public worship is not of great importance, in fixing the principles and securing the influence of the christian religion in the minds of men, and therefore wisely perpetuated. But Mrs Barbauld speaks so fully and eloquently on this point, as well as on others, that nothing needs be said to anticipate her argument. Her essay, as originally published, is entitled Remarks on Mr Gilbert Wakefield's Enquiry into the Expediency and Propriety of Public or Social Worship. It was written more than thirty years ago. A second edition was published in 1792.]

SECTION I.

The Nature of Social or Public Worship, and its Accordance with the best Principles and Feelings of Man.

THERE are some practices, which have not been defended because they have never been attacked. Of this number is Public or Social Worship. It has been recommended, urged, enforced, but never vindicated. Through worldliness, skepticism, indolence, dissatisfaction with the manner of conducting it, it has been often neglected; but it is a new thing to hear it condemned. The pious and the good have lamented its insufficiency to the reformation of the world, but they were yet to learn that it was unfriendly to it. Satisfied with silent and solitary desertion, those who did not concur in the homage paid by their fellow-citizens were content to acquiesce in its propriety, and had not hitherto assumed the dignity of a sect. A late pamphlet of Mr Wakefield's has therefore excited the attention of the public, partly, no doubt, from the known abilities of the author, but still more from the novelty and strangeness of the doctrine. If intended as an apology, no publication can be more reasonable, but if meant as an exhortation, or rather a dehortation, it is a labour which many will think, from the complexion of the times and the tendencies of increasing habits, might well have been spared. It is an awkward circumstance for the apostle of such a persuasion, that he will have many practical disciples whom he will hardly care to own; and that if he succeeds in making proselytes, he must take them from the more sober and orderly part of the community; and class them, as far as this circumstance affords a distinction, along with the uneducated, the profligate, and the unprincipled. The negative tenet he inculcates, does not mark his converts with sufficient precision; their scrupulosity will be in danger of being confounded with the carelessness of their neighbours; and it will be always necessary to ask, do you abstain because you are of this religion, or because you are of no religion at all?

It would be unfair, however, to endeavour to render Mr Wakefield's opinions invidious; they, as well as every other opinion, must be submitted to the test of argument; and public worship, as well as every other practice, must stand on the basis of utility and good sense, or it must not stand at all; and in the latter case, it is immaterial whether it is left to moulder like the neglected ruin, or battered down like the formidable tower.

It will stand upon this basis, if it can be shown to be agreeable to our nature, sanctioned by universal practice, countenanced by revealed religion, and that its tendencies are favourable to the morals and manners of mankind.

What is public worship? Kneeling down together while prayers are said of a certain length and construction, and hearing discourses made to a sentence of scripture called a text! Such might be the definition of an unenlightened person, but such would certainly not be Mr Wakefield's. The question ought to be agitated on much larger ground. If these practices are shown to be novel, it does not follow that public worship is so, in that extensive sense which includes all modes and varieties of expression. To establish its antiquity, we must therefore investigate its nature.

Public worship is the public expression of homage to the Sovereign of the universe. It is that tribute from men united in families, in towns, in communities, which individually men owe to their Maker. Every nation has, therefore, found some organ by which to express this homage, some language, rite, or symbol, by which to make known their religious feelings; but this organ has not always, nor chiefly been words.

The killing an animal, the throwing a few grains of incense into the fire, the eating bread and drinking wine, are all in themselves indifferent actions, and have apparently little connexion with devotion ; yet all of these have been used as worship, and are worship when used with that intention. The solemn sacrifices and anniversary festivals of the Jews, at which their capital and their temple were thronged with votaries from every distant part of the kingdom, were splendid expressions of their religious homage. Their worship, indeed, was interwoven with their whole civil constitution ; and so, though in a subordinate degree, was that of the Greeks and Romans, and most of the states of antiquity. There has never existed a nation, at all civilized, which has not had some appointed form of supplication, some stated mode of signifying the dependence we are under to the Supreme Being, and as a nation imploring his protection.

It is not pretended that these modes were all equally rational, equally edifying, equally proper for imitation, equally suitable for every state of society ; they have varied according as a nation was more or less advanced in refinement and decorum, more or less addicted to symbolical expression—to violent gesticulation—and more or less conversant with abstract ideas and metaphysical speculation. But whether the Deity is worshipped by strewing flowers and building tabernacles of verdure ; by dances round the altar and the shouts of a cheerful people ; by offering the first fruits of harvest, and partaking in the social feast ; by tones of music, interpreted only by the heart ; or by verbal expressions of gratitude and adoration—whether the hallelujahs of assembled multitudes rise together in solemn chorus ; or whether they listen with composed and reverential attention to the voice of one man, appointed by them to be the organ of their feelings—whether a number of people meet together like the Quakers, and each in silence prefers his mental petition—wherever men together perform a stated act as an expression of homage to their Maker, there is the essence of public worship ; and public worship has therefore this mark of being agreeable to the nature of man, that it has been found agreeable to the sense of mankind in all ages and nations.

It is, indeed, difficult to imagine that beings, sensible of common wants and a common nature, should not join together in imploring common blessings ; that, prone as men are in every other circumstance to associate together, and communicate the electric fire of correspondent feelings, they should act with unsocial reserve only where those interests are concerned, which are confessedly the most important. Such is the temperament of man, that in every act and every event he anxiously looks around him to claim the gratulation or sympathy of his fellows. Religion, says Mr Wakefield, is a personal thing ; so is marriage, so is the birth of a child, so is the loss of a beloved relative, yet on all these occasions we are strongly impelled to public solemnity zation. We neither laugh alone, nor weep alone, why then should we pray alone? None of our feelings are of a more communicable nature than our religious ones. If devotion really exists in the heart of each individual, it is morally impossible it should exist there apart and single. So many separate tapers, burning so near each other, in the very nature of things must catch, and spread into one common flame.

The reciprocal advantages, which public and private worship possess over each other, are sufficiently obvious to make both desirable. While the former is more animated, the latter comes more intimately home to our own circumstances and feelings, and allows our devotion to be more particular and appropriated. To most of the objections made against the one, the other is equally liable. Superstition can drop her solitary beads, as well as vociferate the repetition of a public collect; if symptoms of weariness and inattention may be observed in our churches, we have only to look into the diaries of the most pious Christians, and we shall find still heavier complaints of the dulness and deadness of their spiritual frame; the thoughts may wander in the closet when the door is shut; folly and selfishness will send up improper petitions from the cell as well as from the congregation; nay, public worship has this great advantage, that it teaches those to pray, who, not being accustomed to think, cannot of themselves pray with judgment. To all, it teaches that we are not to pray for exclusive advantages, but to consider ourselves as members of a community. Our inmost wishes learn restraint while our petitions are thus directed, and our desires by degrees conform themselves to that spirit of moderation and justice, without which we cannot join in the comprehensive prayer, that must include the joint supplications of a numerous assembly.

Public worship has this further advantage over private, that it is better secured against languor on one side, and enthusiasm on the other. If the devotional sentiment has not taken deep root in his mind, a man will scarcely keep up, in silence and in solitude, an intercourse to which he is prompted by no external appearance, and of which he is reminded by no circumstance of time or place. And if his sense of invisible things is strong enough to engage his mind in spite of these disadvantages, there is room to fear, lest, by brooding in silence over objects of such indistinct vastness, his bewildered ideas and exalted imagination should lead him to the reveries of mysticism; an extreme no less to be dreaded than that of indifference. When Mr Wakefield, to strengthen his argument for seclusion in our religious exercises, directs our attention to the mount of Olives and the garden of Gethsemane, he should recollect that our Saviour sustained a character to which we cannot presume to aspire; and that, however favourable the desert and the wilderness have been to prophets visited by extraordinary illuminations, they cannot be equally suitable to the regular devotion of ordinary Christians.

From the gloom of the cloister and the loneliness of the cell, have proceeded the most extravagant deviations from nature and from reason. Enthusiasm is indeed most dangerous in a crowd, but it seldom originates there. The mind, heated with intense thinking, adopts illusions to which it is not exposed when its devotion is guided and bounded by addresses, which are intended to meet the common sentiments of a numerous assembly. Religion then appears with the most benignant aspect, is then least likely to be mistaken, when the presence of our fellow creatures points out our connexion with the businesses of life and the duties of society. Solitary devotion, for worldly minds, is insufficient, for weak minds it is not profitable, for ardent minds it is not safe.

We must, however, do that justice to the author of the Enquiry, as to confess that he betrays no disposition to carry these exercises to any extreme. On the contrary, some of his expressions seem to strike at the root of all prayer, properly so called, as being the weak effort of an infirm and unphilosophical mind to alter the order of nature and the decrees of Providence, in which it rather becomes the wise man to acquiesce with a manly resignation. Without entering into a discussion, in which, perhaps, we might misrepresent his sentiments; as, in the greater part of his pamphlet, he has taken the ground of Scripture, which undoubtedly countenances the earnestness, and almost the importunity of petition; it may be sufficient for the present purpose to observe, that if there exists a man who, believing himself to be in the continual presence of infinite power, directed by infinite love and tender compassion to all his creatures—thinking often of this Being, and habitually referring every disposition of events to his providence—feeling himself more constantly and intimately connected with him, than with all creation besides—can in every vicissitude of his life, in sickness and in sorrow, in imminent danger, anxious uncertainty, desertion or loss of friends, and all the trying circumstances of humanity that flesh is heir to; forbear, for himself or for those dearer to him than himself, to put up one petition to the throne of God—such a one may be allowed to strike out every petition in the Lord's Prayer but that comprehensive one, thy will be done. If his faith be equally lively, his devotional feelings equally fervent, his sense of dependence upon God equally felt in his inmost soul, we dare not presume to censure the temperance of his religious addresses. We respect the subdued sobriety of his wishes, and we do not, we cannot suppose him deserted by the supreme Being for that modest forbearance, which proceeds from a resignation so absolute and complete.

Others, however, whose philosophy is not of so firm a texture, may plead the example of him who prayed, though with meek submission, that the cup of bitterness might pass from him; and who, as the moment of separation approached, interceded for his friends and followers with all the anxiety of affectionate tenderness. But we will venture to say that practically there is no such philosopher. If prayer were not enjoined for the perfection, it would be permitted to the weakness of our nature. We should be betrayed into it, if we thought it sin, and pious ejaculations would escape our lips, though we were obliged to preface them with, God forgive me for praying!

To those who press the objection, that we cannot see in what manner our prayers can be answered, consistently with the government of the world according to those general laws by which we find, in fact, that it is governed; it may be sufficient to say, that prayer being made almost an instinct of our nature, it cannot be supposed but that, like all other instincts, it has its use; that no idea can be less philosophical than one which implies, that the existence of a God who governs the world, should make no difference in our conduct; and few things less probable than that the childlike submission which bows to the will of a father, should be exactly similar in feature to the stubborn patience, which bends under the yoke of necessity.

It may be further observed, that petitions for temporal advantages, such, I mean, as a spirit of moderation will allow us to wish with sufficient ardour to make them the subject of our prayers, are not liable to more objections than petitions for spiritual blessings. In either case the weak man does, and the wise man does not expect a miracle. That the arrogant, the worldly, and the licentious, should on a sudden, and without their own strenuous endeavours, be rendered humble, simpleminded, and pure of heart, would be as great a violation of the order of nature in the moral world, as it would be in the natural world that the harvest should ripen without the cooperation of the husbandman, and the slow influence of the seasons. Indeed, as temporal blessings are less in our power than dispositions, and are sometimes entirely out of it, it seems more reasonable of the two to pray for the former than for the latter; and it is remarkable that, in the model given us in the Lord's Prayer, there is not a single petition for any virtue or good disposition, but there is one for daily bread. Good dispositions, particularly a spirit of resignation, are declared and implied in the petitions, but they are not prayed for; events are prayed for, and circumstances out of our own power, relative to our spiritual concerns, are prayed for, as, the not being led into temptation; but there is no prayer that we may be made holy, meek, or merciful. Nor is it an objection to praying for health, that sickness may possibly turn out a blessing, since it is no objection to the using all the means in our power to get rid of sickness, which we do as eagerly and as unreservedly, as if we had not the least idea that it ever could be salutary. And we do right; for the advantages of sickness are casual and adventitious; but health is in itself, and in its natural tendencies, a blessing, devoutly to be wished for. That no advantage of this nature ought to be prayed or wished for, unqualified with the deepest submission to the will of God, is an undoubted truth; and it is a truth likewise universally acknowledged by all rational Christians.

It cannot be denied, however, that great reserve is necessary in putting up specific petitions, especially of a public nature; but generally the fault lies in our engaging in wrong pursuits, rather than in imploring upon our pursuits the favour of heaven. Humanity is shocked to hear prayers for the success of an unjust war; but humanity and heaven were then offended when the war was engaged in; for war is of a nature sufficiently serious to warrant our prayers to be preserved from the calamities of it, if we have not voluntarily exposed ourselves to them. The frivolous nature of most national contests appears strongly in this very circumstance, that petitions from either side have the air of a profanation; but if in some serious conjuncture our country was ready to be overwhelmed by an ambitious neighbour, as that of the Dutch was in the time of Louis the Fourteenth,—in such a season of calamity, the sternest philosopher would give way to the instinctive dictates of nature, and implore the help which cometh from on high. The reason why both sides cannot pray with propriety, is because both sides cannot act with justice.

But supposing we were to discard all petition, as the weak effort of infirm minds to alter the unbroken chain of events; as the impatient breathings of craving and restless spirits, not broken into patient acquiescence with the eternal order of Providence—the noblest office of worship still remains.

*Praise is devotion fit for mighty minds,
The jarring world's agreeing sacrifice.*

And this is surely of a social nature. One class of religious duties separately considered, tends to depress the mind, filling it with ingenuous shame and wholesome sorrow; and to these humiliating feelings solitude might perhaps be found congenial; but the sentiments of admiration, love, and joy, swell the bosom with emotions, which seek for fellowship and communication. The flame indeed may be kindled by silent musing; but when kindled it must infallibly spread. The devout heart, penetrated with large and affecting views of the immensity of the works of God, the harmony of his laws, and the extent of his beneficence, bursts into loud and vocal expressions of praise and adoration; and, from a full and overflowing sensibility, seeks to expand itself to the utmost limits of creation. The mind is forcibly carried out of itself, and, embracing the whole circle of animated existence, calls on all above, around, below, to help to bear the burden of its gratitude. Joy is too brilliant a thing to be confined within our own bosoms; it burnishes all nature, and with its vivid colouring gives a kind of factitious life to objects without sense or motion.

There cannot be a more striking proof of the social tendency of these feelings, than the strong propensity we have to suppose auditors where there are none. When men are wanting, we address the animal creation; and, rather than have none to partake our sentiments, we find sentiment in the music of the birds, the hum of insects, and the low of kine; nay, we call on rocks and streams and forests to witness and share our emotions. Hence the royal shepherd, sojourning in caves and solitary wastes, calls on the hills to rejoice and the floods to clap their hands; and the lonely poet, wandering in the deep recesses of uncultivated nature, finds a temple in every solemn grove, and swells his chorus of praise with the winds that bow the lofty cedars. And can he who, not satisfied with the wide range of existence, calls for the sympathy of the inanimate creation, refuse to worship with his fellow men? Can he, who bids "Nature attend," forget to "join every living soul" in the universal hymn? Shall we suppose companions in the stillness of deserts, and shall we overlook them among friends and townsmen? It cannot be! Social worship, for the devout heart, is not more a duty than it is a real want.

SECTION II.

Public Worship countenanced by Revealed Religion.

If Public Worship is thus found to be agreeable to the best impulses of our nature, the pious mind will rejoice to find it, at least, not discountenanced by revealed religion. But its friends, in endeavouring to prove this, must carry on the argument under some disadvantage, as Mr Wakefield, though he lays great stress on the presumptive arguments, which seem to favour the negative side of the question, will not allow the same force to those which may be urged on the other side. The practice of Christ, he tells us, is an authority to which all believers will bow the knee, a tribunal by which all our controversies must be awarded; yet he gives us notice at the same time, that to this authority, if brought against him, he will not bow the knee; and from this tribunal, if unfriendly to his cause, he will appeal; for that prayers and all external observances are beggarly elements, to be laid aside in the present maturity of the christian church; and that, even if social worship were an original appendage of the Gospel, the idea of a progressive Christianity would justify us in rejecting it. With this inequality of conditions, which it is sufficient just to notice, let us consider the array of texts which are drawn up against the practice in question; and particularly those precepts which, Mr Wakefield says, are evidences that directly and literally prove public worship to be unauthorized by christianity, and inconsistent with it, and which he distinguishes from those which condemn it merely by inference.

The first of these direct evidences is the injunction, not to worship as the hypocrites, who are fond of exhibiting in the most public places. "And when thou prayest, be not as the hypocrites, for they love to pray standing in the synagogues, and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men; verily I say unto you, they have their reward. But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father who is in secret." But is it not evident, that the force of this precept is not aimed against public prayer, but against private prayer performed in public; against the ostentatious display which seeks to distinguish us from others, not the genuine sympathy which makes us desirous of blending our feelings with theirs? It was devotion obtruding itself in the face of business, amidst the show and bustle of the world. It did not seek for fellowship, but observation. It did not want the concurrence of men, but to be seen by them. Even in the synagogue it was silent, solitary, unsocial, and with sullen reserve and cold disdain kept itself aloof from communion, and invited only applause. The Pharisee and the Publican both went up to the temple to worship, but they worshipped not together. Certainly the delicate and modest nature of sincere piety must shrink from an exhibition like this ; and would not wish to have its feelings noticed, but where at the same time they may be shared. This text therefore seems to be only a caution respecting the proper performance of our closet duties.

“Jesus saith unto her, Woman, believe me, the hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father. But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth, for the Father seeketh such to worship him. God is a spirit.” True it is, the hour is come in which it is allowed by all rational believers, that the acceptableness of prayer does not depend on the sacredness of any particular place. The Jews wanted to be informed of this. They, naturally enough, were apt to consider their temple as the habitation of the divine Being, in the same manner as a palace is the habitation of an earthly sovereign, a place where men may come to make their court, and bring presents, and ask favours in return. These ideas have been done away by those more honourable notions of the divine Being, which our Saviour and good men after him have laboured to inculcate. We conceive of a church as of a building, not for God to reside, but for men to assemble in ; for, though God is a spirit, men have bodies, and they cannot meet to do any thing without having some place to do it in. Neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, means therefore exclusively, with an idea of any peculiar sacredness, or superstitious preference to any other structure, which might be equally commodious.

With regard to the character of our Saviour himself, it is certain he did not always call upon his disciples to share that more intimate, and, if I may say so, confidential, intercourse with his heavenly Father, which he may be supposed to have been favoured with; and it must be confessed, there is no formal mention made of any exercises of this kind either with them, or with the people at large. But his whole life was a prayer. He, who in his most familiar and convivial moments, was raising the thoughts of his hearers to God, and nourishing their piety by occasional instruction, could not be supposed to leave them disinclined to the intercourses of social piety. The beautiful commendatory prayer, which he offered up when about to leave the world, though it was not entirely of the nature of social prayer, as his disciples did not join in it, yet, its being uttered in their presence, and their being the object of it, seems to place it nearly on the same ground. In the very miracle of the loaves, which Mr Wakefield has produced as an instance of an incident which might have given rise to public prayer, and which was suffered to pass without it; in the account of this very miracle there is a direct precedent for the practice in question; for, looking up to heaven, he blessed before he brake the bread. This, indeed, appears to have been his constant practice. It certainly does not belong to private devotion, and is a species of prayer more apt, perhaps, than any other, to degenerate into a mere form.

But if we do not find public worship, properly so called, in the life of our Saviour, it is because we look for it in the wrong place. It is not to be sought for in his instructions, either to the multitude at large, or to his disciples in their more private conversations. This public worship was paid where the rest of the Jews paid theirs, in the temple. He came up, with the concourse of assembled multitudes, to the appointed religious festivals; he eat the passover, and associated with his fellowcitizens, even in those rites and that form of worship, which he knew was so soon to be abolished.

Our Lord seems indeed to have been an early and regular frequenter of whatever public worship the Jews had among them. What this was, besides their sacrifices and ceremonial observances, Mr Wakefield is infinitely better able than the author of these remarks, to collect from the volumes of Rabbinical learning; but, without going deeper into their antiquities, than what may be gathered from those records of their history, which are in the hands of every one, it may be seen that verbal addresses to the divine being often accompanied the public expressions of their thanksgiving. In their earliest times we have the song of Moses, in the burden of which the whole people, led by Miriam, joined in chorus. In a more polished age, the fine prayer of Solomon at the dedication of the temple, a composition which has never been excelled, comes yet nearer to our ideas of an address to the divine being; and the whole people bore a part in the worship by the response, "for he is good, for his mercy endureth forever."

A still more regular service is recorded by Nehemiah, when the people, after their return from the captivity, entered into that solemn renewal of their law described with so much affecting solemnity. They stood and confessed their sins, then they read the law, after which the Levites called upon them to stand up and bless the Lord their God; they stood up accordingly, and joined in what I suppose the author of the Enquiry would call a pretty long prayer. And when Ezra blessed the Lord, the people answered, Amen, Amen. All this is sufficiently similar not only to the spirit, but to the very routine of our present modes of worship. If it be said, that these instances all arose from peculiar and striking occasions, it may be answered, that it is not likely any other would be recorded; and that the regularity and grace with which they seem to have been performed, indicate a people not unaccustomed to such exercises. Indeed the Psalms of David afford every variety which any of our prayers do; confession, ascription, thanksgiving, &c. These, it should seem, were many of them set to music, and sung with proper responses; for even in the temple, the chief business of which was not prayer but sacrifice, the Levites and other singers, at the time of the morning and evening sacrifice, sung psalms of praise to God before the altar, and in the conclusion the priests blessed the people.* And it is not probable, that in a later period of their history, amidst the greater degree of refinement and cultivation, they should have contented themselves with mere ritual observances.

This at least is evident, if in the time of our Saviour they had no worship similar to ours, he could not mean by anything he said to hint a dislike of it ; and if they had, he must have sanctioned the practice by conforming to it. But indeed it is acknowledged by most, and Mr Wakefield seems to admit, that after their return from the Babylonish captivity, when their hearts were purified by adversity and more attached to their religion, they had regular and stated worship in their synagogues, consisting of forms of prayer, reading the Scriptures, and expounding. In the former, we are told, a minister, called from his office the angel or messenger of the church, officiated as the mouth of the congregation ; but for the latter part of the service it was usual to call upon any stranger to take his share, who appeared to be sufficiently qualified to read and expound the lessons of the day. And hence probably it was, that our Saviour did not pray in the synagogues, though he often taught there, and interpreted the Scriptures.† Of their forms of prayer eighteen are given, held to be of high antiquity and peculiar sacredness ; and these are in a strain not dissimilar to the Liturgies of more modern times. In short, if we trace the accounts given us both of the plan of the service, and of its presbyters, ministers, and deacons, it will be found, that the Christian church, in its corresponding officers, its collects, litanies, and expositions, is the legitimate daughter of the Jewish synagogue ; and we shall be led to admire the singular fate of a nation, decreed to be at once imitated and despised.

Thus much may be sufficient to say upon a subject which, after all, is purely a question of historical curiosity.

To return to the character of our Saviour. His great business in the world was instruction ; and this he dispensed, not in a systematic, but a popular manner ; nor yet in a vague and declamatory style, but in a pointed and appropriated one ; not where it would most shine, but where it was most wanted. He was the great reformer, the innovator of his day ; and the strain of his energetic eloquence was strongly pointed against abuses of all kinds, and precisely those points of duty were most insisted on which he found most neglected. Almost all his discourses are levelled against some prevailing vice of the times, some fashionable worldly maxim, some artful gloss of a well known precept, some evasion of an acknowledged duty. They were delivered as occasion prompted, and therefore it was that they came so home to men's business and bosoms; for he might have delivered the most elaborate lectures on morality, and religion too, without offending the Scribes and Pharisees, if he had confined himself to system, and not attacked corruption. We shall therefore meet with continual disappointment if, in the few scattered discourses, most of them too conversations, which are preserved to us of our Saviour, we expect to find any thing like a regular code of laws, and still less a formulary of rules. He referred to known laws, and only endeavoured to restore the spirit of them, and to exalt the motive of obedience.

The great duty of honouring our parents had probably not found a place in his instructions, but to expose the tradition which had made it of none effect. It is therefore a very inconclusive argument against a practice, either that we are not expressly enjoined it in the Gospel, or that the abuses of it are strongly dwelt upon; and this may serve for a general answer to Mr Wakefield's objections built upon the animated denunciations against those who, for a pretence, make long prayers, and who cry, Lord, Lord,—against vain repetitions—upon the exhortations to worship in spirit and in truth—the declaration that the Sabbath is made for man, and not man for the Sabbath—with a thousand others in the same strain, with which the Gospel undoubtedly abounds. But is the utility of a practice destroyed by the abuse of it, or is it of none, because it is not of the chief value? Are none of our duties subordinate, yet real? Or have they all the proud motto, Aut Cæsar aut nullus?

As to the idea of a progressive Christianity, on which the author of the Enquiry lays so much stress, as no new revelation has been pretended subsequent to its original promulgation, it is difficult to conceive of any progress in it, distinct from the progress of reason and civilisation in the different countries where it may be received. Now I do not know what right we have to suppose that the Jews in the time of our Saviour, were so gross in their ideas as to require a mode of worship, which deserves to be stigmatised with the appellation of beggarly elements and the twilight of superstition. They were probably as different from their countrymen in the time of the Judges, as we are from our ancestors of the Saxon heptarchy. They had long had among them most of those causes, which tend to develop the mental powers. A system of laws and polity, writers of the most distinguished excellence, commercial and political intercourse with other nations; they had acute and subtle disputants, and an acquaintance with different sects of philosophy; and, under these circumstances, it is probable that most of those questions would be agitated which, at similar periods, have exercised and perplexed the human faculties. Be that as it may, Mr Wakefield, by considering public worship as a practice to be adapted to the exigencies of the times, evidently aban-dons the textual ground, in which narrow path he seemed hitherto to have trod with such scrupulous precaution, and places it on the broader footing of utility. The utility of this practice therefore comes next to be considered.

SECTION III.

Advantages derived from the Practice of Social or Public Worship.

It is an error, which is extremely incident to minds of a delicate and anxious sensibility, to suppose that practices do no good, which do not all the good that might be expected from them. Let those who, in a desponding mood, are apt to think thus of public worship, calculate, if they can, what would be the consequence if it were laid aside. Perhaps it is not easy to estimate how much of the manners as well as the morals, how much of the cultivation as well as the religion of a people are derived from this very source. If a legislator or philosopher were to undertake the civilisation of a horde of wild savages, scattered along the waste in the drear loneliness of individual existence, and averse to the faces of each other, if he had formed a plan to gather them together, and give them a principle of cohesion; he probably could not take a more effectual method than by persuading them to meet together in one place, at regular and stated times, and there to join together in a common act, imposing from its solemnity and endearing from the social nature of its exercises.

If an adventurer were stranded on some foreign shore, and should find the inhabitants engaged in such an act, he might draw the conclusion, that the blessings of order, internal peace, mutual confidence, and a considerable degree of information, existed there, as surely as the philosopher drew a similar inference from the discovery of mathematical diagrams traced upon the sand. And thus, in fact, it was, that in the early beginnings of society, legislators called in the assistance of religious ideas, and with the charm and melody of solemn hymns, like those of Orpheus or of Linus, gathered round them the stupid, incurious barbarians, roused them to attention and softened into docility. Agreeably to this train of thinking, our great dramatic moralist places the influences of social worship upon a par with the sacred touches of sympathetic sorrow, and the exhilarating pleasures of the hospitable board, and makes it one of the features which distinguish the urbanity of polished life, from the rude and unfeeling ferocity which belongs to a clan of unprincipled banditti.

If ever you have looked on better days,
If ever been where bells have knolled to church,
If ever sate at any good man's feast,
If ever from your eyelids wiped a tear,
And known what 'tis to pity and be pitied ;
Let gentleness your strong enforcement be.

For, independent of the peculiar object of public religious assemblies, many collateral advantages are derived from them, which the liberal thinker will by no means despise. The recurrence of appointed days of rest and leisure, which, but for this purpose, would never have been appointed, divides the weary months of labour and servitude with a separating line of a brighter colour. The church is a centre of union for neighbours, friends, and townsmen; and it is a reasonable and a pleasing ground of preference in our attachments, that we have "walked to the house of God in company." Even the common greetings that pass between those who meet there, are hallowed by the occasion of the meeting, and the spirit of civic urbanity is mingled with a still sweeter infusion of christian courtesy. By the recurrence of this intercourse, feuds and animosities are composed, which interrupted the harmony of friends and acquaintance; and those who avoided to meet because they could not forgive, are led to forgive, being obliged to meet.

Its effect in humanising the lower orders of society, and fashioning their manners to the order and decorum of civil life, is apparent to every reflecting mind. The poor, who have not formed a habit of attending here, remain from week to week in their sordid cells, or issue thence to places of licentiousness more sordid; while those, who assemble with the other inhabitants of the place, are brought into the frequent view of their superiors; their persons are known, their appearance noted; the inquiring eye of benevolence pursues them to their humble cottages, and they are not unfrequently led home from social worship to the social meal. If the rich and poor were but thus brought together regularly and universally, that single circumstance would be found sufficient to remove the squalidness of misery, and the bitterness of want; and poverty would exist only as a sober shade in the picture of life, on which the benevolent eye might rest with a degree of complacency, when fatigued with the more gaudy colouring of luxury and show.

The good effect of public worship in this light is remarkably conspicuous in the Sunday schools. Many of the children, who attend, have probably not very clearly comprehended any religious system; but the moving and acting under the public eye, together with a sense of duty and moral obligation, which, however obscure, always accompanies the exercises of religion, soon transforms them into a different kind of beings. They acquire a love of neatness and regularity; a sense of propriety insinuates itself into their young minds, and produces, instead of the sullen and untamed licentiousness, which at once shuns and hates the restraints of better life, the modest deference and chastened demeanour of those who respect others because they respect themselves.

Public Worship conveys a great deal of instruction in an indirect manner. Even those didactic prayers which run out into the enumeration of the attributes of the divine Being, and of the duties of a virtuous life, though, perhaps, not strictly proper as prayer, have their use in storing the minds of the generality with ideas on these important subjects; and the beauty and sublimity of many of these compositions must operate powerfully in lifting the heart to God, and inspiring it with a love of virtue. Improper as public prayers may have sometimes been, private prayers are likely to be still more so. Whatever contempt Mr Wakefield may choose to throw on the official abilities of those who lead the service, it will not be denied that they are generally better informed than those who follow. Men to whom spiritual ideas are familiar from reading and study, do not sufficiently appreciate the advantage, which the illiterate enjoy by the fellowship and communication of superior minds, who are qualified to lead their ideas in the right track.

Public Worship is a means of invigorating faith. Though argument be one means of generating belief, and that on which all belief must ultimately rest, it is not the only means, nor, with many minds, the most efficacious. Practical faith is greatly assisted by joining in some act in which the presence and persuasion of others give a sort of reality to our perception of invisible things. The metaphysical reasoner, entangled in the nets of sophistry, may involve himself in the intricacies of contradictory syllogisms till reason grows giddy, and scarcely able to hold the balance; but when he acts in presence of his fellow creatures, his mind resumes its tone and vigour, and social devotion gives a colour and body to the deductions of his reason. Berkeley, probably, never doubted of the existence of the material world when he had quitted his closet. Some minds are not capable of that firmness of decision, which embraces truth upon a bare preponderancy of argument—some, through a timorous and melancholy spirit, remain always in a perplexed and doubting state, if they rest merely on the conclusions built upon their own investigation. But every act in consequence of our faith, strengthens faith. These, when they enter a place of worship, amidst all the animating accompaniments of social homage, are seized with a happy contagion; slow hesitating doubts vanish in a moment, and give way to sincere and cordial feeling. These are not proofs, it is true; but they are helps, adapted to our nature, necessary to the generality, expedient for all. As for the multitude, so unaccustomed are they to any process of abstruse reasoning, and so much do they require the assistance of some object within the grasp of their senses, that it is to be doubted whether they could be at all persuaded of the existence of a spiritual invisible power, if that existence was not statedly acknowledged by some act which should impress the reality of it upon their minds, by connecting it with places, persons, and times.

Let it be observed, in the next place, that Public Worship is a civic meeting. The temple is the only place where human beings, of every rank, and sex, and age, meet together for one common purpose, and join together in one common act. Other meetings are either political, or formed for the purposes of splendor and amusement; from both which, in this country, the bulk of inhabitants are of necessity excluded. This is the only place, to enter which nothing more is necessary than to be of the same species;—the only place, where man meets man not only as an equal but a brother; and where, by contemplating his duties, he may become sensible of his rights. So high and haughty is the spirit of aristocracy, and such the increasing pride of the privileged classes, that it is to be feared, if men did not attend at the same place here, it would hardly be believed they meant to go to the same place hereafter. It is of service to the cause of freedom therefore, no less than to that of virtue, that there is one place where the invidious distinctions of wealth and titles are not admitted; where all are equal, not by making the low, proud, but by making the great, humble

How many a man exists, who possesses not the smallest property in this earth of which you call him lord; who, from the narrowing spirit of property, is circumscribed and hemmed in by the possessions of his more opulent neighbours, till there is scarcely an unoccupied spot of verdure on which he can set his foot to admire the beauties of nature, or barren mountain on which he can draw the fresh air without a trespass. The enjoyments of life are for others, the labours of it for him. He hears those of his class spoken of collectively, as of machines, which are to be kept in repair indeed, but of which the sole use is to raise the happiness of the higher orders. Where, but in the temples of religion, shall he learn that he is of the same species? He hears there, (and were it for the first time, it would be with infinite astonishment,) that all are considered as alike ignorant and to be instructed; all alike sinful and needing forgiveness; all alike bound by the same obligations, and animated by the same hopes.

In the intercourses of the world the poor man is seen, but not noticed; he may be in the presence of his superiors, but he cannot be in their company. In every other place it would be presumption in him to let his voice be heard along with theirs; here alone they are both raised together, and blended in the full chorus of praise. In every other place it would be an offence to be near them, without shewing in his attitudes and deportment the conscious marks of inferiority; here only he sees the prostrations of the rich as low as his, and hears them both addressed together in the majestic simplicity of a language that knows no adulation. Here the poor man learns that, in spite of the distinctions of rank, and the apparent inferiority of his condition, all the true goods of life, all that men dare petition for when in the presence of their Maker—a sound mind, a healthful body, and daily bread, lie within the scope of his own hopes and endeavours; and that in the large inheritance to come, his expectations are no less ample than theirs. He rises from his knees, and feels himself a man. He learns philosophy without its pride, and a spirit of liberty without its turbulence. Every time Social Worship is celebrated, it includes a virtual declaration of the rights of man.

It may be further observed, that the regular services of the church are to us the more necessary, as we have laid aside many of those modes and expressions, which gave a tincture of religion to our social intercourse and domestic manners. The regard to particular days and seasons is nearly worn off. The forms of epistolary correspondence, and the friendly salutations which, in the last century, breathed a spirit of affectionate piety, are exchanged for the degrading ceremonial of unmeaning servility. The God be with you—God bless you—If God permit—Heaven have you in its keeping,—like the graceful Salam, or salutation of peace among the eastern nations, kept up in the mind a sense of the surrounding providence of the Divine Being, and might, in some measure, supersede the necessity of more formal addresses; whereas, in the present state of society, a stranger might pass day after day, and week after week, in the bosom of a christian country, without suspecting the faith of its inhabitants, (if Public Worship were laid aside,) from any circumstance, unless it were the obscure, half-pronounced blessing, which is still sometimes murmured over the table.

Let it therefore be considered, when the length and abstracted nature of our public prayers is objected to, that we have nothing to take their place. If our attention was excited by processions, garlands, altars, and sacrifices, and every action of our lives intermixed with some religious rite, these expressions of our homage might be more readily dispensed with ; but in reality, tedious as Mr Wakefield may think long prayers, they suit better with the gravity of the national disposition and the philosophic turn of our ideas, than any substitute which could be suggested by the most classic taste. Our prayers are become long, because our ceremonies are short.

SECTION IV.

The Obligation of Public Worship universal.

If we may suppose these views of the subject to have established the general utility of Public Worship, a question still arises, is the obligation to it universal? Is attendance on its exercises to be expected from those, whose own minds are temples more hallowed than any they can enter ; and whose knowledge and cultivation render it probable, that in every popular service they will meet with much to object to, and little to interest a taste rendered fastidious by critical accuracy and elegant refinement? Without presuming to condemn the conduct of those, who are in every respect so competent to form their own plans according to their own judgment, I would mention some considerations which, even to them, may present it in a light not unworthy their attention.

It is, in the first place, an act of homage, and as such equally incumbent on all. It is a profession of faith, less dubious even than the performance of moral duties, which may proceed from a well directed prudence, or the harmony of a happy temperament. It is right and proper, that religion should have the honour of those who are calculated to do her honour. It is likewise useful for a pious man to be connected with pious people as such. Various associations are formed upon the ground of something, which men wish to improve or to enjoy in common. Literary men associate, musical men associate, political men associate together; and as there is a great deal of the commerce of the world, in which it would be impossible to introduce religion, there ought by way of balance to be some society of which that is the ground and principle; otherwise, from the very nature of our connexions with each other, we shall find religion less in our thoughts, than almost anything else in which we have an interest, and insensibly it will waste and die away for mere want of aliment. But the attendance of men of literature and knowledge is perhaps most important from its effect upon others. The unenlightened worship with most pleasure, where those worship whose opinions they respect. A religion that is left for the vulgar will not long satisfy even them. There is harshness in saying to the bulk of mankind, Stand aside, we are wiser than you. There is harshness in saying, Our affections cannot move in concert ; what edifies you, disgusts us ; we cannot feel in common, even where we have a common interest.

In the intercourses of life, the man of urbanity makes a thousand sacrifices to the conciliating spirit of courtesy, and the science of attentions. The exercises of devotion, Mr Wakefield says, are wearisome. Suppose they were so, how many meetings do we frequent, to how many conversations do we listen with benevolent attention, where our own pleasure and our own improvement are not the objects to which our time is given up ? He who knows much, must expect to be often present where he can learn nothing. While others are receiving information, he is practising a virtue. He, who in common life has learned to mix a regard to the feelings and opinions of others with the pursuit of his own gratifications, will bear, in the spirit of love and charity, the instruction which to him is unnecessary, the amplification which to him is tiresome, the deficiencies of method or of elocution, to which his ear and his judgment are acutely sensible ; the imperfections, in short, of men or of societies inferior to himself in taste or knowledge ; as in conversation he bears with the communicative overflowings of self importance, the repetition of the well known tale, and the recurrence of the numerous, burdensome forms of civilised society.

It becomes us well to consider what would be the consequence, if the desertion of men of superior sense should become general in our assemblies. Not the abolition of public worship ; it is a practice too deeply rooted in the very propensities of our nature ; but this would be the consequence, that it would be thrown into the hands of professional men on the one hand, and of uninformed men on the other. By the one it would be corrupted, it would be debased by the other. Let the friends of moderation and good sense consider whether it is desirable, whether it is even safe, to withdraw from the public the powerful influence of their taste, knowledge, and liberality. Let them consider whether they are prepared to take the consequences of trusting in the hands of any clergy, so powerful an engine as that of public worship and instruction, without the salutary check of their presence who are best able to distinguish truth from falsehood, to detect unwarrantable pretensions, and to keep within tolerable bounds the wanderings of fanaticism.

Attentive to the signs of the times, they will have remarked, on the one hand, a disposition to give into deception, greater than might naturally have been presumed of this age, which we compliment with the epithet of enlightened. Empiric extravagancies have been adopted, which violate every sober and consistent idea of the laws of nature, and new sects have sprung up distinguished by the wildest reveries of visionary credulity. On the other, they will have observed indications of a desire to discourage the freedom of investigation, to thicken the veil of mystery, and to revive every obsolete pretension of priestly power, which, in the most ignorant periods, the haughtiest churchman has ever dared to assume. They will have read with astonishment an official exhortation to the inferior clergy, it was not fulminated from the Vatican, it was not dragged to light from the mould and rust of remote ages. It was delivered by an English divine of the eighteenth century, brilliant in parts and high in place. He knew it was to meet the notice and encounter the criticism of an enlightened and philosophic people, and he has not scrupled to tell them, that good works of a heretic are sin; and that such a one may go to hell with his load of moral merit on his back. He has not scrupled to rank the first philosopher of this kingdom, and the man in it perhaps of all others most actively solicitous for the spread of what he at least believes to be genuine Christianity, with infidels and atheists; and thus by obvious inference has piously consigned him to the same doom. He has revived claims and opinions, which have upon their heads whole centuries of oblivion and contempt; and by slandering morality, has thought to exalt religion. Reflecting on these things, they will consider whether the man of judgment does not desert the post assigned him by Providence, when he withdraws from popular assemblies both the countenance of his example, and the imposing awe of his presence; they will conceive themselves as invested with the high commission to take care nequid respublica detrimenti capiat; they will consider themselves as the salt of the earth, the leaven of the lump, not to be secluded in separate parcels, but to be mingled in the whole mass, diffusing through it their own spirit and favour.

The author of the Enquiry chooses to expatiate, it is not difficult to do it, on the discordant variety of the different modes of worship practised amongst men, and concludes it with characterising this alarming schism by the comparison of the poet;

One likes the pheasant's wing, and one the leg;
The vulgar boil, the learned roast an egg.

But might we not venture to ask,—Where, pray, is the harm of all this? Unless indeed I will not allow my neighbour to boil his egg because I roast mine. Eggs are good and nutritious food either way; and in the manner of dressing them, fancy and taste, nay caprice, if you will, may fairly be consulted. If I prefer the leg of a pheasant, and my neighbour finds it dry, let each take what he likes. It would be a conclusion singularly absurd, that eggs and pheasants were not to be eaten. All the harm is in having but one table for guests of every description ; and yet even there, were I at a public ordinary, good in other respects, I would rather conform my taste in some measure to that of my neighbour, than be reduced to the melancholy necessity of eating my morsel by myself alone.

The Dissenters cannot be supposed to pass over in silence Mr Wakefield's strictures upon the manner, in which they have chosen to conduct their public and social worship. They are surprised and sorry to find themselves treated with such a mixture of bitterness and levity, by a man whose abilities they respect, and whom they have shewn themselves ready to embrace as a brother. They have their prejudices, they acknowledge, and he perhaps has his. Many forms and observances may to them be dear and venerable, through the force of early habit and association, which to a stranger in their Israel may appear uncouth, unnecessary, or even marked with a shade of ridicule. They pity Mr Wakefield's peculiar and insulated situation. Separating through the purest motive from one church, he has not found another with which he is inclined to associate ; divided by difference of opinions from one class of Christians, and by dissonance of taste from another, he finds the transition too violent from the college to the conventicle ; he worships alone because he stands alone ; and is, naturally perhaps, led to undervalue that fellowship, which has been lost to him between his early predilections and his later opinions.

If, however, the Dissenters are not so happy as to gain his affection, they must be allowed to urge their claims upon his esteem. They wish him to reflect, that neither his classical knowledge, nor his critical acumen, nor his acknowledged talents, set him so high in the esteem of good men, as that integrity which he possesses in common with those whom he despises; they believe further consideration would suggest to him, that it were more candid to pass over those peculiarities, which have originated in a delicate conscience and the fervour of devotion; and they cannot help asking, whether they had reason to expect the severity of sarcastic ridicule from him, whose best praise it is, that he has imitated their virtues and shared their sacrifices?

The Dissenters, however, do not make it their boast that they have nothing to reform. They have, perhaps, always been more conspicuous for principle than for taste; their practices are founded upon a prevalence of religious fervour, an animation and warmth of piety, which, if it no longer exists, it is vain to simulate. But what they do make their boast is, that they acknowledge no principle which forbids them to reform; that they have no leave to ask of bishops, synods, or parliaments, in order to lay aside forms which have become vapid. They are open to conviction; they are ready to receive with thankfulness every sober and liberal remark, which may assist them to improve their religious addresses, and model them to the temper of the public mind.

But, with regard to those practices of suberabundant devotion, which have drawn down upon them the indignation of the critic, it is the opinion of those who best know the Dissenters of the present day, that they might have been suffered to fall quietly of themselves; they are supported by no authority, defrayed by no impost. If they make long prayers, it is at the expense only of their own breath and spirits; no widows' houses are devoured by it. If the present generation yawn and slumber over the exercises, which their fathers attended with pious alacrity, the sons will of course learn to shorten them. If the disposition of their public services wants animation, as perhaps it does, the silent pews will be deserted one by one, and they will be obliged to seek some other mode of engaging the attention of their audience. But modes and forms affect not the essence of public worship; that may be performed with a form or without one; by words alone, or by symbolical expressions, combined with or separated from instruction; with or without the assistance of a particular order appointed to officiate in leading the devotions; it may be celebrated one day in seven, or in eight, or in ten; in many of these particulars a certain deference should be had to the sentiments of that society with which, upon the whole, we think it best to connect ourselves, and as times and manners change, these circumstances will vary ; but the root of the practice is too strongly interwoven with the texture of the human frame ever to be abandoned. While man has wants, he will pray ; while he is sensible of blessings, he will offer praise ; while he has common wants and common blessings, he will pray and praise in company with his fellows ; and while he feels himself a social being, he will not be persuaded to lay aside social worship.

SECTION V.

In what Respect many of the Forms and Habits of Public Worship are susceptible of Improvement.

It must, however, be acknowledged, that, in order to give Public Worship all the grace and efficacy of which it is susceptible, much alteration is necessary. It is necessary here, as in every other concern, that timely reformation should prevent neglect. Much might be done by judgment, taste, and a devotional spirit united, to improve the plan of our religious assemblies. Should a genius arise amongst us qualified for such a task, and in circumstances favourable to his being listened to, he would probably remark first, on the construction of our churches, so ill adapted are a great part of them to the purposes either of hearing or seeing. He would reprobate those little gloomy solitary cells, planned by the spirit of aristocracy, which deform the building no less to the eye of taste than to the eye of benevolence, and insulating each family within its separate inclosure, favour at once the pride of rank and the laziness of indulgence. He might choose for these structures something of the amphitheatrical form, where the minister, on a raised platform, should be beheld with ease by the whole wave of people, at once bending together in deep humiliation, or spreading forth their hands in the earnestness of petition.

It would certainly be found desirable, that the people should themselves have a large share in the performance of the service, as the intermixture of their voices would both introduce more variety and greater animation; provided pains were taken by proper teaching to enable them to bear their part with a decorum and propriety, which, it must be confessed, we do not see at present amongst those whose public services possess the advantage of responses. The explaining, and teaching them to recite such hymns and collects, as it might be thought proper they should bear a part in, would form a pleasing and useful branch of the instruction of young people, and of the lower classes; it would give them an interest in the public service, and might fill up agreeably a vacant hour either on the Sunday, or on some other leisure day, especially if they were likewise regularly instructed in singing for the same purpose.

As we have never seen, perhaps we can hardly conceive, the effect which the united voices of a whole congregation, all in the lively expression of one feeling, would have upon the mind. We should then perceive not only that we were doing the same thing in the same place, but that we were doing it with one accord. The deep silence of listening expectation, the burst of united praises, the solemn pauses that invite reflection, the varied tones of humiliation, gratitude, or persuasion, would swell and melt the heart by turns; nor would there be any reason to guard against the wandering eye, when every object it rested on must forcibly recall it to the duties of the place. Possibly it might be found expedient to separate worship from instruction; the learned teacher from the leader of the public devotions, in whom voice, and popular talents, might perhaps be allowed to supersede a more deep and critical acquaintance with the doctrines of theology. One consequence, at least, would follow such a separation, that instruction would be given more systematically.

Nothing that is taught at all is taught in so vague and desultory a manner as the doctrines of religion. A congregation may attend for years, even a good preacher, and never hear the evidences of either natural or revealed religion regularly explained to them: they may attend for years, and never hear a connected system of moral duties extending to the different situations and relations of life; they may attend for years, and not even gain any clear idea of the history and chronology of the Old and New Testament, which are read to them every Sunday. They will hear abundance of excellent doctrine, and will often feel their hearts warmed and their minds edified ; but their ideas upon these subjects will be confused and imperfect, because they are treated on in a manner so totally different from everything else, which bears the name of instruction. This is probably owing, in a great measure, to the custom of prefixing to every pulpit discourse a sentence, taken indiscriminately from any part of the Scriptures, under the name of a text, which at first implying an exposition, was afterwards used to suggest a subject, and is now, by degrees, dwindling into a motto. Still, however, the custom subsists ; and while it serves to supersede a more methodical course of instruction, tends to keep up in the minds of the generality of hearers a very superstitious idea, not now entertained, it is to be presumed, by the generality of those who teach, of the equal sacredness and importance of every part of so miscellaneous a collection.

If these insulated discourses, of which each is complete in itself, and therefore can have but little compass, were digested into a regular plan of lectures, supported by a course of reading, to which the audience might be directed, it would have the further advantage of rousing the inattentive and restraining the rambling hearer by the interest which would be created by such a connected series of information. They would occupy a larger space in the mind, they would more frequently be the subject of recollection and meditation ; there would be a fear of missing one link in such a chain of truths, and the more intelligent part of a congregation might find a useful and interesting employment, in assisting the teacher in the instruction of those, who were not able to comprehend instruction with the same facility as themselves.

When such a course of instruction had been delivered, it would not be expected that discourses, into which men of genius and learning had digested their best thoughts, should be thrown by, or brought forward again, as it were, by stealth ; but they would be regularly and avowedly repeated at proper intervals. It is usual upon the continent for a set of sermons to be delivered in several churches, each of which has its officiating minister for the stated public worship ; and thus a whole district partakes the advantage of the labours of a man eminent for composition. Perhaps it might be desirable to join to religious information some instruction in the laws of our country, which are, or ought to be, founded upon morals ; and which, by a strange solecism, are obligatory upon all, and scarcely promulgated, much less explained. Many ideas will offer themselves to a thinking man, who wishes not to abolish, but to improve the public worship of his country. These are only hints, offered with diffidence and respect, to those who are able to judge of and carry them into effect.

Above all, it would be desirable to separate from religion that idea of gloom, which in this country has but too generally accompanied it. The fact cannot be denied; the cause must be sought, partly in our national character, which I am afraid is not naturally either very cheerful or very social, and which we shall do well to meliorate by every possible attention to our habits of life; and partly to the colour of our religious systems. No one who embraces the common idea of future torments, together with the doctrine of election and reprobation, the insufficiency of virtue to escape the wrath of God, and the strange absurdity which, it should seem, through similarity of sound alone has been admitted as an axiom, that sins committed against an Infinite Being do therefore deserve infinite punishment, no one, I will venture to assert, can believe such tenets, and have them often in his thoughts, and yet be cheerful.

Whence a system has arisen so incompatible with that justice and benevolence, which in the discourses of our Saviour are represented as the most essential attributes of the Divine Being, is not easy to trace. It is probable, however, that power, being the most prominent feature in our conceptions of the Creator, and that of which we see the most striking image here on earth, (there being a greater portion of uncontrolled power, than of unmixed wisdom or goodness to be found amongst human beings,) the Deity would naturally be likened to an absolute monarch;—and most absolute monarchs having been tyrants, jealous of their sovereignty, averse to freedom of investigation, ordering affairs, not with a view to the happiness of their subjects, but to the advancement of their own glory; not to be approached but with rich gifts and offerings; bestowing favours, not in proportion to merit, but from the pure influence of caprice and blind partiality; to those who have offended them severe, and unforgiving, except induced to pardon by the importunate intercession of some favourite; confining their enemies, when they had overcome them, after a contest, in deep, dark dungeons under ground, or putting them to death in the prolonged misery of excruciating tortures,—these features of human depravity have been most faithfully transferred to the Supreme Being; and men have imaged to themselves how a Nero or a Domitian would have acted, if, from the extent of their dominion there had been no escape, and to the duration of it no period.

These ideas of the vulgar belief, terrible, but as yet vague and undefined, passed into the speculations of the schoolmen, by whom they were combined with the metaphysical idea of eternity, arranged in specific propositions, fixed in creeds, and elaborated into systems, till at length they have been sublimed into all the tremendous horrors of the calvinistic faith. These doctrines, it is true, among thinking people, are losing ground; but there is still apparent, in that class called serious Christians, a tenderness in exposing them; a sort of leaning towards them, as in walking over a precipice one should lean to the safest side; an idea that they are, if not true, at least good to be believed, and that a salutary error is better than a dangerous truth. But that error can neither be salutary nor harmless, which attributes to the Deity injustice and cruelty ; and that religion must have the worst of tendencies, which renders it dangerous for man to imitate the being whom he worships.

Let those who hold such tenets consider, that the invisible Creator has no name, and is identified only by his character ; and they will tremble to think what being they are worshipping, when they invoke a power capable of producing existence, in order to continue it in never ending torments. The God of the Assembly's Catechism is not the same God with the Deity of Thomson's Seasons, and of Hutcheson's Ethics. Unity of character, in what we adore, is much more essential than unity of person. We often boast, and with reason, of the purity of our religion, as opposed to the grossness of the theology of the Greeks and Romans ; but we should remember, that cruelty is as much worse than licentiousness, as a Moloch is worse than a satyr.

When will Christians permit themselves to believe, that the same conduct which gains them the approbation of good men here, will secure the favour of heaven hereafter ? When will they cease making their court to their Maker by the same servile debasement, and affectation of lowliness, by which the vain potentates of the earth are flattered ? When a harmless and well meaning man, in the exaggerated figures of theological rhetoric, calls himself the vilest of sinners, it is in precisely the same spirit of false humility, in which the courtier uses degrading and disqualifying expressions, when he speaks of himself in his adulatory addresses to his sovereign. When a good man draws near the close of a life, not free indeed from faults, but pure from crime, a life spent in the habitual exercise of all those virtues which adorn and dignify human nature, and in the uniform approach to that perfection, which is confessedly unattainable in this imperfect state,—when a man, perhaps like Dr Price, whose name will be ever pronounced with affectionate veneration and deep regard by all the friends of philosophy, virtue, and mankind, is about to resign his soul into the hands of his Maker, he ought to do it, not only with a reliance on his mercy, but his justice; a generous confidence and pious resignation should be blended in his deportment. It does not become him to pay the blasphemous homage of deprecating the wrath of God, when he ought to throw himself into the arms of his love. He is not to think that virtue is one thing here, and another in heaven; or that he on whom blessings and eulogiums are ready to burst from all honest tongues, can be an object of punishment with him, who is infinitely more benevolent than any of his creatures.

These remarks may be thought foreign to the subject in question; but in fact they are not so. Public

Worship will be tinctured with gloom, while our ideas of its object are darkened by superstition; it will be infected with hypocrisy, while its professions and tenets run counter to the genuine, unperverted moral sense of mankind; it will not meet the countenance of philosophers, so long as we are obliged to unlearn our ethics, in order to learn divinity. Let it be considered that these opinions greatly favour immorality. The doctrine that all are vile, and equally merit a state of punishment, is an idea as consolatory to the profligate, as it is humiliating to the saint; and that is one reason why it has always been a favourite doctrine. The indecent confidence of a Dodd*, and the debasing terrors of a Johnson, or of more blameless men than he, spring from one and the same source. It prevents the genuine workings of real penitence, by enjoining confessions of imaginary demerit; it quenches religious gratitude, because conceiving only of two states of retribution, both in the extreme, and feeling that our crimes, whatever they may be, cannot have deserved the one, we are not sufficiently thankful for the prospect of the other, which we look upon as only a necessary alternative. Lastly, it dissolves the connexion between religion and common life, by

* 'And admitted, as I trust I shall be, to the realms of bliss before you, I shall hail your arrival there with transport, and rejoice to acknowledge that you was my comforter, my advocate, and my friend.'—Letter from Dr Dodd to Dr Johnson. See Boswell's Life of Johnson, Vol. II. p. 140.

introducing a set of phrases and a standard of moral feeling, totally different from those ideas of praise and blame, merit and demerit, upon which we do and must act in our commerce with our fellow creatures.

There are periods in which the human mind seems to slumber, but this is not one of them. A keen spirit of research is now abroad, and demands reform. Perhaps in none of the nations of Europe will their articles of faith, or their church establishments, or their modes of worship, be able to maintain their ground for many years in exactly the same position in which they stand at present. Religion and manners reciprocally act upon one another. As religion, well understood, is a most powerful agent in meliorating and softening our manners; so, on the other hand, manners, as they advance in cultivation, tend to correct and refine our religion. Thus, to a nation in any degree acquainted with the social feelings, human sacrifices, and sanguinary rites, could never long appear obligatory.

The mild spirit of Christianity has, no doubt, had its influence in softening the ferocity of the Gothic times; and the increasing humanity of the present period will, in its turn, produce juster ideas of Christianity, and diffuse through the solemnities of our worship, the celebration of our sabbaths, and every observance connected with religion, that air of amenity and sweetness, which is the offspring of literature, and the peaceful intercourses of society. The age which has demolished dungeons, rejected torture, and given so fair a prospect of abolishing the iniquity of the slave trade, cannot long retain among its articles of belief the gloomy perplexities of Calvinism, and the heart withering perspective of cruel and never ending punishments.

ON THE
DEVOTIONAL TASTE,
AND ON ESTABLISHMENTS.

FROM MRS BARBAULD'S MISCELLANEOUS PROSE PIECES.

It is observed by a late most amiable and elegant writer, that religion may be considered in three different views. As a system of opinions, its sole object is truth; and the only faculty that has anything to do with it is reason, exerted in the freest and most dispassionate inquiry. As a principle regulating our conduct, religion is a habit, and like all other habits, of slow growth, and gaining strength only by repeated exertions. But it may likewise be considered as a taste, an affair of sentiment and feeling, and in this sense it is properly called Devotion. Its seat is in the imagination and the passions, and it has its source in that relish for the sublime, the vast, and the beautiful, by which we taste the charms of poetry and other compositions that address our finer feelings; rendered more lively and interesting by a sense of gratitude for personal benefits. It is in a great degree constitutional, and is by no means found in exact proportion to the virtue of a character.

It is with relation to this last view of the subject, that the observations in this essay are hazarded; for though, as a rule of life, the authority and salutary effects of religion are pretty universally acknowledged, and though its tenets have been defended with sufficient zeal, its affections languish, the spirit of Devotion is certainly at a very low ebb amongst us, and what is surprising, it has fallen, I know not how, into a certain contempt, and is treated with great indifference, amongst many of those who value themselves on the purity of their faith, and who are distinguished by the sweetness of their morals. As the religious affections in a great measure rise and fall with the pulse, and are affected by everything which acts upon the imagination, they are apt to run into strange excesses; and if directed by a melancholy or enthusiastic faith, their workings are often too strong for a weak head, or a delicate frame; and for this reason they have been almost excluded from religious worship by many persons of real piety. It is the character of the present age to allow little to sentiment, and all the warm and generous emotions are treated as romantic by the supercilious brow of a cold hearted philosophy. The man of science, with an air of superiority, leaves them to some florid declaimer, who professes to work upon the passions of the lower class, where they are so debased by noise and nonsense, that it is no wonder if they move disgust in those of elegant and better informed minds.

Yet there is a devotion, generous, liberal, and humane, the child of more exalted feelings than base minds can enter into, which assimilates man to higher natures, and lifts him "above this visible diurnal sphere." Its pleasures are ultimate, and, when early cultivated, continue vivid even in that uncomfortable season of life when some of the passions are extinct, when imagination is dead, and the heart begins to contract within itself. Those, who want this taste, want a sense, a part of their nature, and should not presume to judge of feelings to which they must ever be strangers. No one pretends to be a judge in poetry or the fine arts, who has not both a natural and a cultivated relish for them; and shall the narrow minded children of earth, absorbed in low pursuits, dare to treat as visionary, objects which they have never made themselves acquainted with? Silence on such subjects will better become them. But to vindicate the pleasures of devotion to those, who have neither taste nor knowledge about them, is not the present object. It rather deserves our inquiry, what causes have contributed to check the operations of religious impressions amongst those, who have steady principles, and are well disposed to virtue.

And, in the first place, there is nothing more prejudicial to the feelings of a devout heart, than a habit of disputing on religious subjects. Free inquiry is undoubtedly necessary to establish a rational belief; but a disputatious spirit, and fondness for controversy, give the mind a sceptical turn, with an aptness to call in question the most established truths. It is impossible to preserve that deep reverence for the Deity with which we ought to regard him, when all his attributes, and even his very existence, become the subject of familiar debate. Candour demands that a man should allow his opponent an unlimited freedom of speech, and it is not easy in the heat of discourse to avoid falling into an indecent or careless expression; hence those who think seldomer of religious subjects, often treat them with more respect, than those whose profession keeps them constantly in their view. A plain man of a serious turn would probably be shocked to hear questions of this nature treated with that ease and negligence, with which they are generally discussed by the practised Theologian, or the young lively Academic ready primed from the schools of logic and metaphysics. As the ear loses its delicacy by being obliged only to hear coarse and vulgar language, so the veneration for religion wears off by hearing it treated with disregard, though we ourselves are employed in defending it; and to this it is owing, that many who have confirmed themselves in the belief of religion, have never been able to recover that strong and affectionate sense of it, which they had before they began to inquire, and have wondered to find their devotion grown weaker when their faith was better grounded. Indeed, strong reasoning powers and quick feelings do not often unite in the same person. Men of a scientific turn seldom lay their hearts open to impression. Previously biassed by the love of system, they do indeed attend the offices of religion, but they dare not trust themselves with the preacher, and are continually upon the watch to observe whether every sentiment agrees with their own particular tenets.

The spirit of inquiry is easily distinguished from the spirit of disputation. A state of doubt is not a pleasant state. It is painful, anxious, and distressing beyond most others; it disposes the mind to dejection and modesty. Whoever therefore is so unfortunate as not to have settled his opinions in important points, will proceed in the search of truth with deep humility, unaffected earnestness, and a serious attention to every argument that may be offered, which he will be much rather inclined to revolve in his own mind, than to use as materials for dispute. Even with these dispositions, it is happy for a man when he does not find much to alter in the religious system he has embraced; for if that undergoes a total revolution, his religious feelings are too generally so weakened by the shock, that they hardly recover again their original tone and vigour.

Shall we mention Philosophy as an enemy to religion? God forbid! Philosophy,

Daughter of Heaven, that slow ascending still Investigating sure the form of things,
With radiant finger points to Heaven again.

Yet there is a view in which she exerts an influence perhaps rather unfavourable to the fervour of simple piety. Philosophy does indeed enlarge our conceptions of the Deity, and give us the sublimest ideas of his power and extent of dominion; but it raises him too high for our imaginations to take hold of, and in a great measure destroys that affectionate regard, which is felt by the common class of pious Christians. When, after contemplating the numerous productions of this earth, the various forms of being, the laws, the mode of their existence, we rise yet higher, and turn our eyes to that magnificent profusion of suns and systems, which astronomy pours upon the mind; when we grow acquainted with the majestic order of nature, and those eternal laws which bind the material and intellectual worlds; when we trace the footsteps of creative energy through regions of unmeasured space, and still find new wonders disclosed and pressing upon the view; we grow giddy with the prospect; the mind is astonished, confounded at its own insignificance; we think it almost impiety for a worm to lift its head from the dust, and address the Lord of so stupendous a universe; the idea of communion with our Maker shocks us as presumption, and the only feeling the soul is capable of in such a moment is a deep and painful sense of its own abasement. It is true, the same philosophy teaches that the Deity is intimately present through every part of this complicated system, and neglects not any of his works ; but this is a truth which is believed without being felt ; our imagination cannot here keep pace with our reason, and the sovereign of nature seems ever further removed from us, in proportion as we enlarge the bounds of his creation.

Philosophy represents the Deity in too abstracted a manner to engage our affections. A Being without hatred and without fondness, going on in one steady course of even benevolence, neither delighted with praises, nor moved by importunity, does not interest us so much as a character open to the feelings of indignation, the soft relentings of mercy, and the partialities of particular affections. We require some common nature, or at least the appearance of it, on which to build our intercourse. It is also a fault of which philosophers are often guilty, that they dwell too much in generals. Accustomed to reduce every thing to the operation of general laws, they turn our attention to larger views, attempt to grasp the whole order of the universe, and in the zeal of a systematic spirit seldom leave room for those particular and personal mercies, which are the food of gratitude. They trace the great outline of nature, but neglect the colouring which gives warmth and beauty to the piece. As in poetry it is not vague and general description, but a few striking circumstances clearly related and strongly worked up—as in a landscape it is not such a vast extensive range of country as pains the eye to stretch to its limits, but a beautiful, well defined prospect, which gives the most pleasure—so neither are those unbounded views in which philosophy delights, so much calculated to touch the heart as home views and nearer objects. The philosopher offers up general praises on the altar of universal nature ; the devout man, on the altar of his heart, presents his own sighs, his own thanksgivings, his own earnest desires ; the former worship is more sublime, the latter more personal and affecting.

We are likewise too scrupulous in our public exercises, and too studious of accuracy. A prayer strictly philosophical must ever be a cold and dry composition. From an over anxious fear of admitting any expression that is not strictly proper, we are apt to reject all warm and pathetic imagery, and, in short, everything that strikes upon the heart and the senses. But it may be said, “ If the Deity be indeed so sublime a being, and if his designs and manner are so infinitely beyond our comprehension, how can a thinking mind join in the addresses of the vulgar, or avoid being overwhelmed with the indistinct vastness of such an idea. Far be it from me to deny, that awe and veneration must ever make a principal part of our regards to the Master of the universe, or to defend that style of indecent familiarity, which is yet more shocking than indifference ; but let it be considered that we cannot hope to avoid all improprieties in speaking of such a Being ; that the most philosophical address we can frame is probably no more free from them, than the devotions of the vulgar ; that the Scriptures set us an example of accommodating the language of prayer to common conceptions, and making use of figures and modes of expression far from being strictly defensible ; and that, upon the whole, it is safer to trust to our genuine feelings, feelings implanted in us by the God of nature, than to any metaphysical subtleties. He has impressed me with the idea of trust and confidence, and my heart flies to him in danger ; of mercy to forgive, and I melt before him in penitence ; of bounty to bestow, and I ask of him all I want or wish for. I may make use of an inaccurate expression, I may paint him to my imagination too much in the fashion of humanity ; but while my heart is pure, while I depart not from the line of moral duty, the error is not dangerous. Too critical a spirit is the bane of everything great or pathetic. In our creeds let us be guarded ; let us there weigh every syllable ; but in compositions addressed to the heart, let us give freer scope to the language of the affections, and the overflowing of a warm and generous disposition.

Another cause which most effectually operates to check devotion, is ridicule. I speak not here of open derision of things sacred ; but there is a certain ludicrous style in talking of such subjects, which, without any ill design, does much harm ; and perhaps those, whose studies or profession lead them to be chiefly conversant with the offices of religion, are most apt to fall into this impropriety ; for their ideas being chiefly taken from that source, their common conversation is apt to be tinctured with fanciful allusions to scripture expressions, to prayers, &c. which have all the effect of a parody, and, like parodies, destroy the force of the finest passage, by associating it with something trivial and ridiculous. Of this nature is Swift's well known jest of " Dearly beloved Roger," which whoever has strong upon his memory, will find it impossible to attend with proper seriousness to that part of the service. We should take great care to keep clear from all these trivial associations, in whatever we wish to be regarded as venerable.

Another species of ridicule to be avoided, is that kind of sneer often thrown upon those whose hearts are giving way to honest emotion. There is an extreme delicacy in all the finer affections, which makes them shy of observation, and easily checked. Love, Wonder, Pity, the enthusiasm of Poetry, shrink from the notice of even an indifferent eye, and never indulge themselves freely but in solitude, or when heightened by the powerful force of sympathy. Observe an ingenuous youth at a well wrought tragedy. If all around him are moved, he suffers his tears to flow freely ; but if a single eye meets him with a glance of contemptuous indifference, he can no longer enjoy his sorrow ; he blushes at having wept, and in a moment his heart is shut up to every impression of tenderness. It is sometimes mentioned as a reproach to Protestants, that they are susceptible of a false shame when observed in the exercises of their religion, from which Papists are free. But I take this to proceed from the purer nature of our religion ; for the less it is made to consist in outward pomp and mechanical worship, and the more it has to do with the finer affections of the heart, the greater will be the reserve and delicacy which attend the expression of its sentiments. Indeed, ridicule ought to be very sparingly used ; for it is an enemy to everything sublime or tender ; the least degree of it, whether well or ill founded, suddenly and instantaneously stops the workings of passion ; and those who indulge a talent that way, would do well to consider, that they are rendering themselves forever incapable of all the higher pleasures either of taste or morals. More especially do these cold pleasantries hurt the minds of youth, by checking that generous expansion of heart to which their open tempers are naturally prone, and producing a vicious shame, through which they are deprived of the enjoyment of heroic sentiments or generous action.

In the next place, let us not be superstitiously afraid of superstition. It shews great ignorance of the human heart, and the springs by which its passions are moved, to neglect taking advantage of the impression, which particular circumstances, times and seasons, naturally make upon the mind. The root of all superstition is the principle of the association of ideas, by which, objects naturally indifferent become dear and venerable, through their connexion with interesting ones. It is true, this principle has been much abused ; it has given rise to pilgrimages innumerable, worship of relics, and priestly power. But let us not carry our ideas of purity and simplicity so far as to neglect it entirely. Superior natures, it is possible, may be equally affected with the same truths at all times, and in all places ; but we are not so made. Half the pleasures of elegant minds are derived from this source. Even the enjoyments of sense, without it, would lose much of their attraction. Who does not enter into the sentiment of the poet, in that passage so full of nature and truth.

He that outlives this hour, and comes safe home,
 Shall stand on tiptoe when this day is named,
 And rouse him at the name of Crispian ;
 He that outlives this day and sees old age,
 Will yearly on the vigil feast his neighbours,
 And say, tomorrow is St Crispian's.

But were not the benefits of the victory equally apparent on any other day of the year? Why commemorate the anniversary with such distinguished regard? Those who can ask such a question, have never attended to some of the strongest instincts in our nature. Yet it has lately been the fashion, amongst those who call themselves rational Christians, to treat as puerile, all attentions of this nature when relative to religion. They would

Kiss with pious lips the sacred earth,
Which gave a Hampden or a Russell birth.

They will visit the banks of Avon with all the devotion of enthusiastic zeal ; celebrate the birth day of the hero and the patriot ; and yet pour contempt upon the Christian, who suffers himself to be warmed by similar circumstances relating to his Master, or the connexion of sentiments of peculiar reverence with times, places, and men, which have been appropriated to the service of religion. A wise preacher will not, from a fastidious refinement, disdain to affect his hearers from the season of the year, the anniversary of a national blessing, a remarkable escape from danger, or, in short, any incident that is sufficiently guarded, and far enough removed from what is trivial, to be out of danger of becoming ludicrous.

It will not be amiss to mention here, a reproach which has been cast upon devotional writers, that they are apt to run into the language of love. Perhaps the charge would be full as just, had they said that Love borrows the language of Devotion ; for the votaries of that passion are fond of using those exaggerated expressions, which can suit nothing below Divinity ; and you can hardly address the greatest of all Beings in a strain of more profound adoration, than the lover uses to the object of his attachment. But the truth is, Devotion does in no small degree resemble that fanciful and elevated kind of love, which depends not on the senses. Nor is the likeness to be wondered at, since both have their source in the love of beauty and excellence. Both are exceeding prone to superstition, and apt to run into romantic excesses. Both are nourished by poetry and music, and felt with the greatest fervour in the warmer climates. Both carry the mind out of itself, and powerfully refine the affections from everything gross, low, and selfish.

But it is time to retire ; we are treading upon enchanted ground, and shall be suspected by many of travelling towards the regions of chivalry and old romance. And were it so, many a fair majestic idea might be gathered from those forgotten walks, which would well answer the trouble of transplanting. It must however be owned, that very improper language has formerly been used on these subjects ; but there cannot be any great danger of such excesses, where the mind is guarded by a rational faith, and the social affections have full scope in the free commerce and legitimate connexions of society.

Having thus considered the various causes, which contribute to deaden the feelings of devotion, it may not be foreign to the subject to inquire in what manner they are affected by the different modes of religion. I speak not of opinions ; for these have much less influence upon the heart, than the circumstances which attend particular persuasions. A sect may only differ from an establishment, as one absurd opinion differs from another ; but there is a character and cast of manners belonging to each, which will be perfectly distinct ; and of a sect, the character will vary as it is a rising or a declining sect, persecuted or at ease. Yet while divines have wearied the world with canvassing contrary doctrines and jarring articles of faith, the philosopher has not considered, as the subject deserved, what situation was most favourable to virtue, sentiment, and pure manners. To a philosophic eye, free from prejudice, and accustomed to large views of the great polity carried on in the moral world, perhaps varying and opposite forms may appear proper, and well calculated for their respective ends ; and he will neither wish entirely to destroy the old, nor wholly to crush the new.

The great line of division between different modes of religion, is formed by Establishments and Sects. In an infant sect, which is always in some degree a persecuted one, the strong union and entire affection of its followers, the sacrifices they make to principle, the force of novelty, and the amazing power of sympathy, all contribute to cherish devotion. It rises even to passion, and absorbs every other sentiment. Severity of manners imposes respect ; and the earnestness of the new proselytes renders them insensible to injury, or even to ridicule. A strain of eloquence, often coarse indeed, but strong and persuasive, works like leaven in the heart of the people. In this state, all outward helps are superfluous, the living spirit of devotion is amongst them, the world sinks away to nothing before it, and every object but one is annihilated. The social principle mixes with the flame, and renders it more intense; strong parties are formed, and friends or lovers are not more closely connected, than the members of these little communities.

It is this kind of devotion, a devotion which those of more settled and peaceable times can only guess at, which made amends to the first Christians for all they resigned, and all they suffered; this draws the martyr to a willing death, and enables the confessor to endure a voluntary poverty. But this stage cannot last long; the heat of persecution abates, and the fervour of zeal feels a proportional decay. Now comes on the period of reasoning and examination. The principles, which have produced such mighty effects on the minds of men, acquire an importance, and become objects of the public attention. Opinions are canvassed. Those who before bore testimony to their religion only by patient suffering, now defend it with argument; and all the keenness of polemical disquisition is awakened on either side. The fair and generous idea of religious liberty, which never originates in the breast of a triumphant party, now begins to unfold itself. To vindicate these rights, and explain these principles, learning, which in the former state was despised, is assiduously cultivated by the sectaries; their minds become enlightened, and a large portion of knowledge, especially religious knowledge, is diffused through their whole body. Their manners are less austere, without having as yet lost anything of their original purity. Their ministers gain respect as writers, and their pulpit discourses are studied and judicious. The most unfavourable circumstance of this æra is, that those who dissent, are very apt to acquire a critical and disputatious spirit; for, being continually called upon to defend doctrines in which they differ from the generality, their attention is early turned to the argumentative part of religion; and hence we see that sermons, which afford food for this taste, are with them thought of more importance than prayer and praise, though these latter are undoubtedly the more genuine and indispensable parts of public worship.

This then is the second period; the third approaches fast; men grow tired of a controversy, which becomes insipid from being exhausted; persecution has not only ceased, it begins to be forgotten; and from the absence of opposition in either kind, springs a fatal and spiritless indifference. That sobriety, industry, and abstinence from fashionable pleasures, which distinguished the fathers, has made the sons wealthy; and, eager to enjoy their riches, they long to mix with that world, a separation from which was the best guard to their virtues. A secret shame creeps in upon them, when they acknowledge their relation to a disesteemed sect; they therefore endeavour to file off its peculiarities, but in so doing they destroy its very being. Connexions with the establishment, whether of intimacy, business, or relationship, which formerly, from their superior zeal, turned to the advantage of the sect, now operate against it. Yet these connexions are formed more frequently than ever; and those who a little before, soured by the memory of recent suffering, betrayed perhaps an aversion from having any thing in common with the church, now affect to come as near it as possible; and, like a little boat that takes a large vessel in tow, the sure consequence is, the being drawn into its vortex. They aim at elegance and show in their places of worship, the appearance of their preachers, &c. and thus impolitically awaken a taste it is impossible they should ever gratify. They have worn off many forbidding singularities, and are grown more amiable and pleasing. But those singularities were of use; they set a mark upon them, they pointed them out to the world, and thus obliged persons so distinguished to exemplary strictness. No longer obnoxious to the world, they are open to all the seductions of it. Their minister, that respectable character which once inspired reverence and affectionate esteem, their teacher and their guide, is now dwindled into the mere leader of the public devotions; or, lower yet, a person hired to entertain them every week with an elegant discourse. In proportion as his importance decreases, his salary sits heavy on the people; and he feels himself depressed by that most cruel of all mortifications to a generous mind, the consciousness of being a burden upon those from whom he derives his scanty support. Unhappily, amidst this change of manners, there are forms of strictness, and a set of phrases introduced in their first enthusiasm, which still subsist; these they are ashamed to use, and know not how to decline; and their behaviour, in consequence of them, is awkward and irresolute. Those, who have set out with the largest share of mysticism and flighty zeal, find themselves particularly embarrassed by this circumstance.

When things are come to this crisis, their tendency is evident; and though the interest and name of a sect may be kept up for a time by the generosity of former ages, the abilities of particular men, or that reluctance which keeps a generous mind from breaking old connexions; it must, in a short course of years, melt away into the establishment, the womb and the grave of all other modes of religion.

An Establishment affects the mind by splendid buildings, music, the mysterious pomp of ancient ceremonies; by the sacredness of peculiar orders, habits, and titles; by its secular importance; and by connecting with religion, ideas of order, dignity, and antiquity. It speaks to the heart through the imagination and the senses; and though it never can raise devotion so high, as we have described it in a beginning sect, it will preserve it from ever sinking into contempt. As, to a woman in the glow of health and beauty, the most careless dress is the most becoming; but when the freshness of youth is worn off, greater attention is necessary, and rich ornaments are required to throw an air of dignity round her person ; so while a sect retains its first plainness, simplicity and affectionate zeal, it wants nothing an establishment could give ; but that once declined, the latter becomes far more respectable. The faults of an establishment grow venerable from length of time ; the improvements of a sect appear whimsical from their novelty. Ancient families, fond of rank, and of that order which secures it to them, are on the side of the former. Traders incline to the latter ; and so do generally men of genius, as it favours their originality of thinking. An establishment leans to superstition, a sect to enthusiasm ; the one is a more dangerous and violent excess, the other more fatally debilitates the powers of the mind ; the one is a deeper colouring, the other a more lasting dye ; but the coldness and languor of a declining sect produces skepticism. Indeed, a sect is never stationary, as it depends entirely on passions and opinions ; though it often attains excellence, it never rests in it, but is always in danger of one extreme or the other ; whereas an old establishment, whatever else it may want, possesses the grandeur arising from stability.

We learn to respect whatever respects itself ; and are easily led to think that system requires no alteration, which never admits of any. It is this circumstance, more than any other, which gives a dignity to that accumulated mass of error, the Church of Rome. A fabric, which has weathered many successive ages, though the architecture be rude, the parts disproportionate, and overloaded with ornament, strikes us with a sort of admiration, merely from its having held so long together.

The minister of a sect, and of an establishment, is upon a very different footing. The former is like the popular leader of an army ; he is obeyed with enthusiasm while he is obeyed at all ; but his influence depends on opinion, and is entirely personal ; the latter resembles a general appointed by the monarch ; he has soldiers less warmly devoted to him, but more steady, and better disciplined. The dissenting teacher is nothing, if he have not the spirit of a martyr ; and is the scorn of the world, if he be not above the world. The clergyman, possessed of power and affluence, and for that reason chosen from among the better ranks of people, is respected as a gentleman, though not venerated as an apostle ; and as his profession generally obliges him to decent manners, his order is considered as a more regular and civilised class of men, than their fellow subjects of the same rank. The dissenting teacher, separated from the people, but not raised above them, invested with no power, entitled to no emoluments, if he cannot acquire for himself authority, must feel the bitterness of dependance. The ministers of the former denomination cannot fall, but in some violent convulsion of the state ; those of the latter, when indifference and mutual neglect begin to succeed to that close union, which once subsisted between them and their followers, lose their former influence without resource ; the dignity and weight of their office are gone for ever ; they feel the insignificance of their pretensions, their spirits sink, and, except they take refuge in some collateral pursuit, and stand candidates for literary fame, they slide into an ambiguous and undecided character ; their time is too often sacrificed to frivolous compliances ; their manners lose their austerity, without having proportionally gained in elegance ; the world does not acknowledge them, for they are not of the world ; it cannot esteem them, for they are not superior to the world.

Upon the whole, then, it should seem, that the strictness of a sect, (and it can only be respectable by being strict,) is calculated for a few finer spirits, who make Religion their chief object. As to the much larger number, on whom she has only an imperfect influence, making them decent if not virtuous, and meliorating the heart without greatly changing it ; for all these the genius of an establishment is more eligible, and better fitted to cherish that moderate devotion of which alone they are capable. All those who have not strength of mind to think for themselves, who would live to virtue without denying the world, who wish much to be religious, but more to be genteel—naturally flow into the establishment. If it offered no motives to their minds, but such as are perfectly pure and spiritual, their devotion would not for that be more exalted, it would die away to nothing ; and it is better their minds should receive only a tincture of religion, than be wholly without it. Those too, whose passions are regular and equable, and who do not aim at abstracted virtues, are commonly placed to most advantage within the pale of the national faith.

All the greater exertions of the mind, spirit to reform, fortitude and constancy to suffer, can be expected only from those who, forsaking the common road, are exercised in a peculiar course of moral discipline ; but it should be remembered, that these exertions cannot be expected from every character, nor on every occasion. Indeed, religion is a sentiment which takes such strong hold on all the most powerful principles of our nature, that it may easily be carried to excess. The Deity never meant our regards to him should engross the mind ; that indifference to sensible objects, which many moralists preach, is not perhaps desirable, except where the mind is raised above its natural tone, and extraordinary situations call forth extraordinary virtues.

If the peculiar advantages of a sect were well understood, its followers would not be impatient of those moderate restraints, which do not rise to persecution, nor affect any of their more material interests ; for, do they not bind them closer to each other, cherish zeal, and keep up the love of liberty ? What is the language of such restraints ? Do they not say, with a prevailing voice, Let the timorous and the worldly depart ; no one shall be of this persuasion, who is not sincere disinterested, conscientious. It is notwithstanding proper, that men should be sensible of all their rights, assert them boldly, and protest against every infringement ; for it may be of advantage to bear what yet it is unjustifiable in others to inflict.

Neither would dissenters, if they attended to their real interests, be so ambitious as they generally are, of rich converts. Such converts only accelerate their decline ; they relax their discipline, and they acquire an influence very pernicious in societies, which ought to breathe nothing but the spirit of equality.

Sects are always strict in proportion to the corruption of establishments and the licentiousness of the times, and they are useful in the same proportion. Thus the austere lives of the primitive Christians counterbalanced the vices of that abandoned period ; and thus the Puritans, in the reign of Charles the Second, seasoned with a wholesome severity the profligacy of public manners. They were less amiable than their descendants of the present day ; but to be amiable was not the object ; they were of public utility ; and their scrupulous sanctity, (carried to excess, themselves only considered,) like a powerful antiseptic, opposed the contagion breathed from a most dissolute court. In like manner, that sect, one of whose most striking characteristics is a beautiful simplicity of dialect, served to check that strain of servile flattery and Gothic compliment so prevalent in the same period, and to keep up some idea of that manly plainness with which one human being ought to address another.

Thus have we seen that different modes of religion, though they bear little good will to each other, are nevertheless mutually useful. Perhaps there is not an establishment so corrupt, as not to make the gross of mankind better than they would be without it. Perhaps there is not a sect so eccentric, but that it has set some one truth in the strongest light, or carried some one virtue, before neglected, to its utmost height, or loosened some obstinate and long rooted prejudice. They answer their end ; they die away ; others spring up, and take their place. So the purer part of the element, continually drawn off from the mighty mass of waters, forms rivers, which, running in various directions, fertilize large countries ; yet, always tending towards the ocean, every accession to their bulk or grandeur but precipitates their course, and hastens their reunion with the common reservoir from which they were separated.

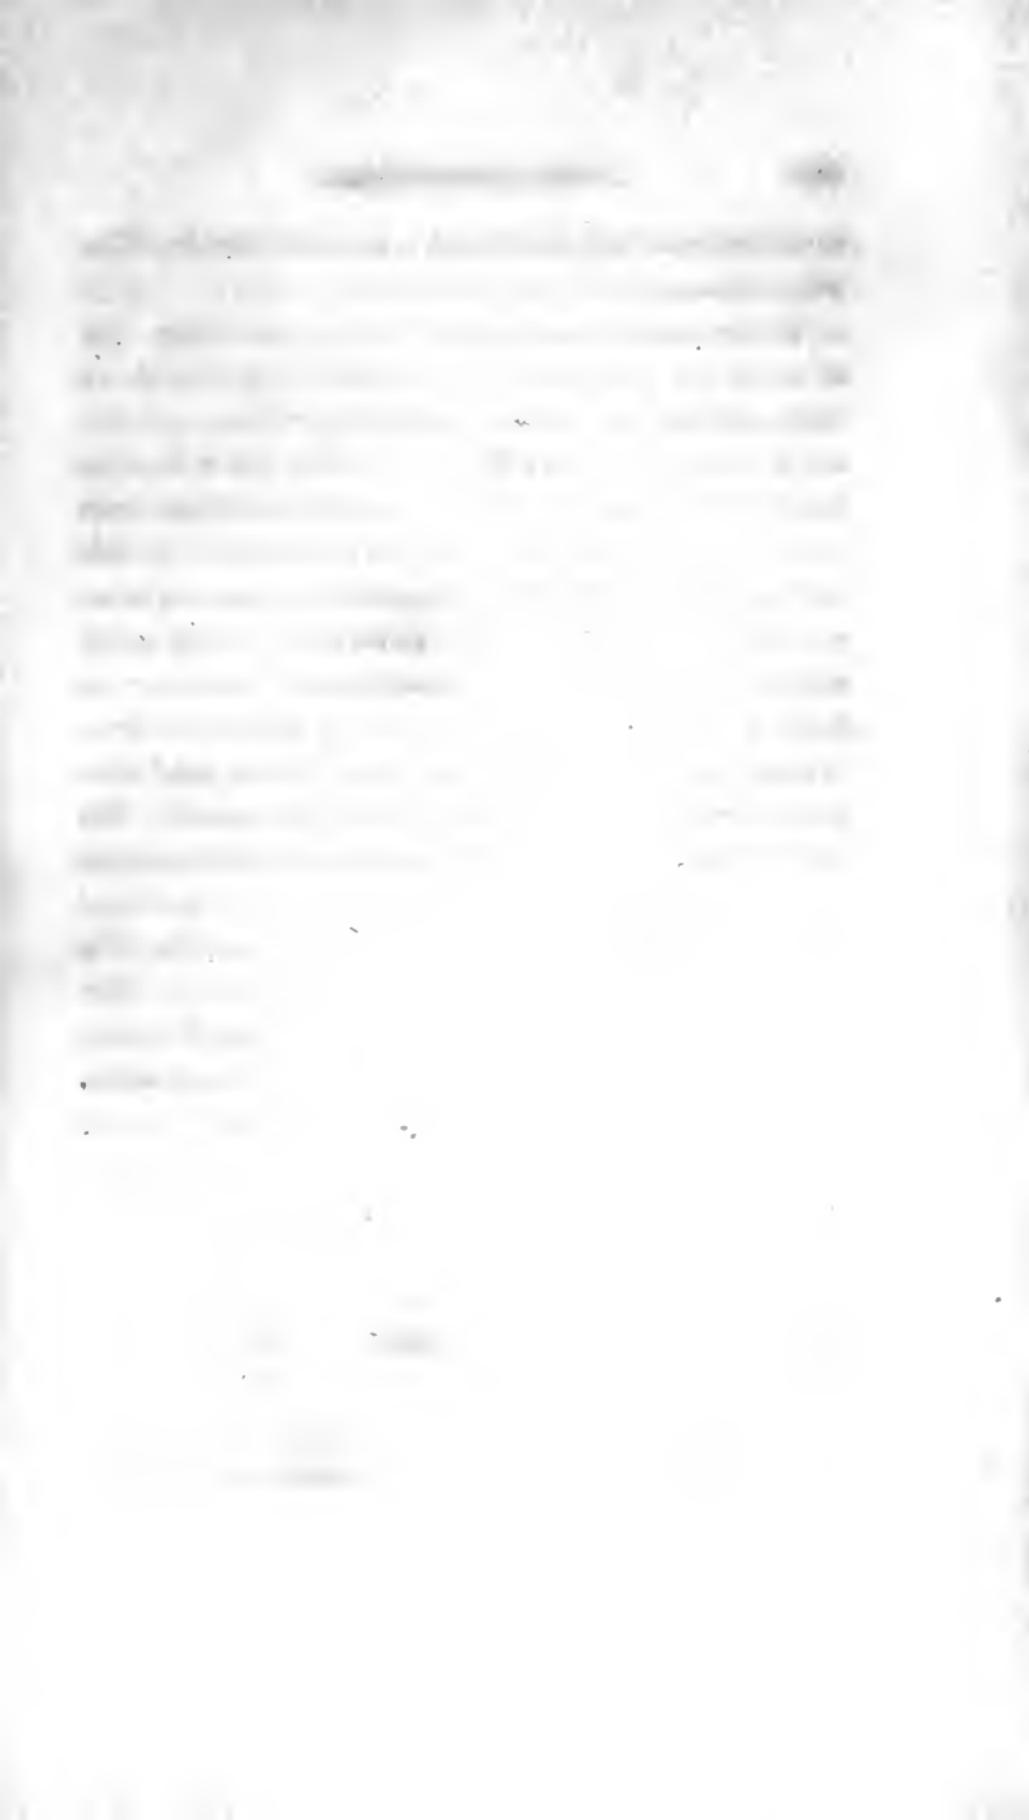

In the mean time, the devout heart always finds associates suitable to its disposition, and the particular cast of its virtues ; while the continual flux and reflux of opinions prevent the active principles from stagnating. There is an analogy between things material and immaterial. As, from some late experiments in philosophy it has been found, that the process of vegetation restores and purifies vitiated air ; so does that moral and political ferment, which accompanies the growth of new sects, communicate a kind of spirit and elasticity necessary to the vigour and health of the soul, but soon lost amidst the corrupted breath of an indiscriminate multitude.

There remains only to add, lest the preceding view of Sects and Establishments should in any degree be misapprehended, that it has nothing to do with the truth of opinions, and relates only to the influence, which the adventitious circumstances attending them may have upon the manners and morals of their followers. It is therefore calculated to teach us candour, but not indifference. Large views of the moral polity of the world may serve to illustrate the providence of God, in his different dispensations, but are not made to regulate our own individual conduct, which must conscientiously follow our own opinions and belief. We may see much good in an Establishment, the doctrines of which we cannot give our assent to without violating our integrity ; we may respect the tendencies of a Sect, the tenets of which we utterly disapprove. We may think practices useful, which we cannot adopt without hypocrisy. We may think all religions beneficial, and believe of one alone that it is true.
